

FROM THE STORM TO THE FIRE

The Truth Behind the Silence

Daniel “Bret” Lingar

Copyright

FROM THE STORM TO THE FIRE The Truth Behind the Silence

Copyright © 2026 Daniel “Bret” Lingar.

All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced, stored, transmitted, or distributed in any form or by any means—electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, scanning, or otherwise—without prior written permission from the author, except for brief quotations used in reviews, commentary, or educational discussion.

This book is a memoir. It reflects the author’s lived experience, memory, perspective, personal interpretation, and healing process. Some names, identifying details, timelines, and circumstances may be changed or compressed to protect privacy and preserve narrative flow.

This book discusses trauma, addiction, Complex PTSD, grief, suicide, abuse, mental health, family conflict, legal consequences, and recovery. It is not intended as medical, psychological, legal, or professional advice. Readers experiencing crisis, suicidal thoughts, withdrawal, abuse, or medical emergencies should seek immediate support from qualified professionals or emergency services.

For mental health crisis support in the United States, call or text 988 to reach the Suicide & Crisis Lifeline.

Author: Daniel “Bret” Lingar Cover Design: Daniel “Bret” Lingar Interior Text: Daniel “Bret” Lingar

First Edition Printed in the United States of America

Dedication

For Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, and Adalee.

You were never the reason I broke.

You were the reason something in me kept reaching for light, even when I did not know how to hold it.

This book is not me asking you to carry my pain.

It is me finally learning how to name it, own it, and stop handing it down.

I love you more than every word in these pages.

Always.

Content Note

This book contains direct discussion of Complex PTSD, childhood trauma, domestic violence, addiction, drug use, relapse, grief, suicide, suicidal thoughts, family conflict, emotional abuse, shame, medical issues, legal consequences, and recovery.

Some chapters describe traumatic events, substance use, death, emotional collapse, and suicidal pain in plain language.

This book is not written to shock you. It is written to tell the truth. But truth can still hit hard.

Read it at your own pace. Pause when you need to. Skip what you need to. Come back when you can.

If anything in these pages brings up thoughts of hurting yourself, ending your life, relapsing, or feeling like you cannot stay safe, reach out immediately. In the United States, call or text 988 for the Suicide & Crisis Lifeline. If you are in immediate danger, call emergency services or go to the nearest emergency room.

You do not have to solve your whole life tonight. You only have to stay.

One breath. One minute. One call. One more page, only if you are safe enough to turn it.

Table of Contents

[TOC]

PREFACE: THE WIRING

For years, I thought I was broken. Lazy. Toxic. Crazy. My ex-wife told me I was bipolar. Doctors slapped labels on me like tags on a carcass. I believed them. I took the pills. I drank the booze. I smoked the meth. I thought it was a character flaw.

Then a therapist looked me in the eye and said,

“It’s not what’s wrong with you. It’s what happened to you.”

Complex PTSD. C-PTSD.

It clicked.

Like a key in a rusted lock.

It ain’t just one bad day. It’s a lifetime of them. It starts in the NICU. Thirty days. No mother’s touch. Just wires and alarms and a priest giving me last rites because I was dying. My body learned distance before it learned love. It learned that survival means staying still. Staying quiet.

Don't take up space.

Then came the violence. Age six. Hiding under a blanket while my mom got beaten. Learning that danger erupts without warning. Learning that freezing is the only way to survive.

Then the losses. My cousin Nicholas—ruled suicide, felt like murder. My brother Garrett — dead at thirty-two in a wreck I couldn't stop. My mom—gone in 2021. Twenty-three names on a list of dead people I loved.

When you live like that, your brain changes. It stops looking for peace and starts scanning for threats. It catastrophizes because tragedy is the only thing that feels real. When I missed court dates, it wasn't defiance. It was freeze. My body locked up like it did under that blanket. When I used drugs, it wasn't because I didn't love my kids. It was because the pain had no off switch and I needed to survive the night.

I'm not telling you this to excuse the damage. I caused pain. I failed my kids. I burned relationships. I own that. But understanding the wiring stops the shame from eating me alive. It shifts the question from "Why am I so fucked up?" to "How did I survive this long?"

This book started as me trying to figure out how the hell I got here. How did a three-pound baby in a glass box become a grown man who couldn't feel safe in his own skin?

How did the kid under the blanket become the man hiding in closets?

How did booze, pills, meth, work, isolation, and shame become the tools I reached for just to survive another day?

How did I keep hurting people I loved while trying not to die inside?

That was the first question.

How?

But once the smoke started clearing, the question changed.

It wasn't just how anymore.

It became why.

Why did my body treat peace like a setup?

Why did shame feel more believable than love?

Why did chaos feel familiar?

Why did substances feel like rescue?

Why did connection feel like danger?

Why did I keep reacting like the past was still happening?

That's what this book became.

The first half is the journey through the wreckage.

The second half is the autopsy of the fire.

Not to make it pretty.

Not to erase the damage.

Not to ask for pity.

To understand the machinery.

Because you can't rebuild a life if you don't know what kept burning it down.

PROLOGUE: THE PREDICTIVE MODEL

People call it paranoia.

I call it data.

My brain predicts the worst because the worst is usually what happens.

The start: born dying in an incubator. Wiring set to danger.

The systems: cops ruled my cousin's death suicide when it was murder. So yeah, I don't trust the legal system.

The loss: when you lose twenty-three people, expecting tragedy isn't negative. It's realistic.

The cycle: stress hits. Brain freezes. I miss court. Warrant issues. See? I told you it would go to hell.

It's a self-fulfilling prophecy built on evidence.

That's what people miss when they talk about trauma like it's just memory. Trauma doesn't just leave you with flashbacks. It builds a model. A prediction engine. A system inside you that starts scanning for the next disaster before the current moment has even had a chance to prove itself safe.

My nervous system learned early that good moments are temporary and danger doesn't announce itself politely. It kicks the door in. It changes the temperature of a room. It shows up in the middle of dinner, in the middle of sleep, in the middle of a marriage, in the middle of trying to get clean, in the middle of thinking maybe this time life might finally settle down.

So yeah, I brace.

I overread tone.

I catastrophize.

I assume silence means something bad is coming.

I assume peace is temporary.

I assume if I care about something, I'm probably going to lose it.

That ain't me being dramatic.

That's my predictive model doing exactly what it was trained to do.

The problem is, a nervous system built to survive hell doesn't know how to live in ordinary life. It doesn't know what to do with a calm day. It mistrusts comfort. It scans safety for cracks. It sees

The stories they told me later only confirmed what my body already knew—I wasn't meant to be here.

A few days after birth, my tiny systems began shutting down. They called a priest to my incubator while monitors screamed warnings. He gave me last rites. Then something shifted—maybe stubbornness, maybe grace—and my vitals started rising. The priest's prayers hung in the air while the machines registered my decision to stay.

I didn't know it then, but that box became my blueprint.

Don't cry too loud.

Don't take up too much space.

Stay still and maybe you'll survive.

That's how my life started—with distance. First the distance of an unfinished journey, then the distance between life and death, and finally the distance of glass walls keeping the world at bay.

And that distance never left.

That learned stillness, that bracing silence, was my first refuge when the noise came years later.

The storm arrived when I was five, after my parents split. Mom found someone new—a man whose presence felt like a clenched fist, wiry and mean. Violence moved into our house then, unpredictable and brutal. The screams ripped through the night like thunder too close, rattling the walls of our cramped rental.

I was six, huddled under a thin blanket that smelled of mildew and sweat, twisting it in my fists until my knuckles throbbed. It was all I had to hold back the chaos spilling from the living room.

My heart pounded like a trapped bird, each beat whispering, It's happening again.

"Please, stop—no!"

Mom's voice cracked through the dark, sharp and desperate, glass breaking mid-scream. I wanted to run to her, shield her somehow, but fear was a vise—cold, tight, locking me in place.

The same total freeze that would hijack my body decades later. If I moved, I'd be next.

We kids caught some of it, but Mom bore the brunt.

One night, I heard a snap—like a dry twig—and peeked through the crack in the door.
Her arm hung wrong, limp and swollen, while a towering shape loomed over her, yelling about nothing.

The terror didn't just lock me awake; it followed me into sleep. I wet the bed long after other kids stopped, until I was eleven—a secret shame my body carried, a physical testament to how unsafe I felt deep in my bones, even when I was unconscious.

CPS came to school once, asking about bruises, about being hurt at home. "Only when we are bad," I mumbled, my sister nodding.

I thought it was normal.

I thought it was part of learning.

Some nights, we ran.

Mom would burst in, eyes wild, hair tangled like she'd fought a windstorm.

"Go, now!" she'd rasp, tearing the blanket off us.

We bolted barefoot into the dark. Gravel tore at my feet, sharp and wet, each step a jolt of pain while my lungs burned on frozen air. My brother was safe with Dad then, missing the mess.

We'd sprint for Uncle's—a big, creaky two-story with tall ceilings and peeling paint—but Mom always lagged.

I'd glance back and see her pulled by a shadow, an arm snagging her elbow.

Why doesn't she keep running? I'd think, chest tight.

It lasted six months.

Then the relationship ended.

But terror doesn't leave when the man does.

It burrows in.

Around ten, sleep itself became another battleground. I started experiencing sleep paralysis—waking frozen, unable to move or scream, often feeling an intense, suffocating presence in the room. My body had learned stillness in the incubator and terror under the blanket. Now it was carrying both into the night.

A year later, the man was dead.

Mom cried into the phone when Grandma told her.

I stood there, waiting for relief.

None came.

Just static in my head.

Even in death, he left me with storms.

CHAPTER 2

THE FIRE IGNITES

The storm died down by my teens, but peace never really came.

Not peace peace.

Not the kind where your body unclenches and believes the room is safe.

The outside got quieter, but something inside me stayed lit. Jumpy. Sharp. Hot under the skin.

By then, I didn't have the words for it. I didn't know what a nervous system was. I didn't know what hypervigilance meant. I didn't know trauma could live in the body like a second pulse.

All I knew was that I couldn't relax.

School felt like a pressure cooker.

Crowded halls. Lockers slamming. Voices bouncing off cinderblock walls. Fluorescent lights buzzing overhead like they were wired directly into my skull. Too many eyes. Too many bodies.

Too much sound.

My hands trembled.

Not from alcohol yet.

From people.

Too loud.

Too close.

Too unpredictable.

I'd walk through the hallway with my shoulders tight, head down, shirt sticking to my back, convinced every glance held judgment. My palms stayed wet. My chest stayed tight. I didn't know how to be around people without feeling exposed.

Later, I'd call it social anxiety.

Back then, it was just:

Why can't I shake this?

Why does everybody else seem normal?

Why does my body act like walking into school is walking into danger?

I didn't know I was still under the blanket.

Different building.

Same body.

Different noise.

Same alarm.

The storm at home had taught me to brace. The glass box had taught me distance.
School just gave the alarm more targets.

By thirteen, things looked calmer. My parents remarried. Mom and Dad patched things up, and for a minute, it felt like maybe the wall had been rebuilt after years of shelling.

Home didn't feel like a battlefield every night.

But by fifteen, I was burning inside.

Quiet fire.

Twitchy fire.

The kind nobody sees until smoke starts leaking out of your mouth.

School became a cage. Every hallway felt like a gauntlet. Every classroom felt like being trapped in a room full of people who might turn on me without warning. I couldn't breathe in there anymore.

So I walked.

Grabbed a GED and told everyone it was for money, for work.

That was the half-truth.

The whole truth?

I left because my body couldn't stand being watched.

I moved in with my uncle.

Big man. Vietnam vet. Purple Heart on the wall. Cold beer always in reach. The music was good. The stories were better. There was a kind of rough comfort in that house. Not safe exactly, but familiar.

I drank for free.

Sixteen to seventeen.

Lost in a haze that felt like home.

Booze crept in before that. Sips from Uncle's cans when I was four, a kid playing big. But at sixteen, it stopped being play.

It became a tool.

A cousin's trailer. Football blasting. A table sticky with spills. Somebody tossed me a Bud Light and said, "Go for it."

I did.

Then another.

Then Zimas.

Then tequila that scorched all the way down.

Two hours later, it was gone.

All of it.

"I drank it," I mumbled, the room tilting.

He jolted up.

“Bullshit.”

But it was true.

I woke up on the bathroom floor, tile cold against my skin, head by the toilet, puke sour in my throat.

“God, kill this,” I croaked. “I’ll quit.”

Lie.

Because something had happened before the vomiting.

Something important.

For a few hours, the shaking stopped.

The world loosened.

My body quit screaming.

The noise turned down.

That’s the hook people miss.

It wasn’t fun first.

It was relief.

And when your baseline is panic, relief feels holy.

By seventeen, drinking ruled more of me than I wanted to admit.

Wild Turkey in one hand. Vodka in the other. Shots swapping until my throat burned raw. Then blood came up. Red in the sink. Ulcers clawing my gut like my own body had started attacking me from the inside.

So I switched to beer.

Lighter.

Less pain.

Same purpose.

Keep the fire quiet.

Keep the hands steady.

Keep the body from crawling out of itself.

I'd sit there with a can sweating in my grip, head pulsing, world swaying if I moved too fast, knowing it was wrecking me.

Knowing wasn't enough.

The need to numb was stronger than the knowledge.

Then everything broke again.

My cousin Nicholas took a bullet to the head.

Cops called it suicide.

I didn't buy it.

No way.

He smiled too much. Loved too hard. Had too much life in him for the story they handed us.

But this was Johnson County, Arkansas. Three deaths in three months, all tied around the same circle, and nobody batted an eye. Just another chapter in a town that eats its own and calls it normal.

After he died, I unraveled.

Suicidal thoughts hit like a freight train in 1999.

Not sadness.

Not teenage drama.

A full-body collapse.

The kind where the future disappears and every minute feels like something you have to survive.

I spent a month in the hospital.

Quit weed.

Got sober for a minute.

Swore I'd become a cop. Find justice. Dig out the truth. Learn the system and make it work the way it was supposed to.

I interviewed at the jail. Spent a few hours shadowing the day shift.

At the end, the guy looked me in the eye and said, "You just want to learn the system so you can help your people when they get locked up."

Wrote me off like I was already dirty.

That's when I learned what small-town judgment really costs.

They didn't see a kid trying to make meaning out of a murder they called suicide.

They saw a last name.

A family.

A category.

A future inmate trying to sneak behind the desk.

That kind of judgment sticks.

It teaches you that even when you try to climb out, somebody is standing there ready to remind you where they think you belong.

Fifteen years later, I did the digging myself.

We were right.

It was murder.

But it wasn't who we thought.

It was Johnny.

Pulled the trigger while Kris, my cousin's girlfriend, stood by. She went to the store before it happened, came back all tears and gasps like she didn't know.

It was staged.

All of it.

That kind of truth doesn't bring peace.

It just proves your nervous system wasn't crazy for refusing the official story.

My uncle shattered after Nicholas died.

Tried to take his life twice while I was just down the hall.

First time, pills scattered across the kitchen table like confetti from hell.

Second time, he put a .22 in his gut.

I called my mom, barely able to speak.

"I'm not right," I choked out.

First real panic attack.

Sweat.

Gasping.

No air.

Childhood fear grew teeth and came back to chew.

At seventeen, pain found a new way in.

A migraine knocked me flat.

Blinding.

Nauseating.

The kind that makes light feel violent.

I was sprawled on the couch in the dark, whispering, "Turn the lights off."

Mom handed me a pill.

Hydro.

Something numbing.

Thirty minutes later, I was at the sink, scrubbing dishes like I had been reborn.

"What is this?" I asked, soap dripping from my hands.

"Kills pain. Feels good," she said.

I'd never touched a damn plate before.

Now I was floating.

Not high in the way people think.

Quiet.

Functional.

Normal.

The next day, I popped one before work at Western Sizzlin.

Thought:

This'll make the grind bearable.

That was the beginning.

Hydros.

CHAPTER 3

Tylenol 3s and 4s.

Darvocets.

Morphine.

K-pins.

Chewed-up fentanyl patches.

Anything that numbed.

Later, Roxy.

Straight to the vein.

I wasn't just silencing physical pain.

I was muting the constant roar inside.

The fire had found fuel.

And once it did, it didn't just burn.

It consumed.

PAIN TAKES ROOT

The discharge papers from 1999 said I was stable.

Stable.

That word looks clean on paper.

Like somebody checked a box and the storm inside me agreed to behave.

I told myself I was done.

Clean slate.

Straight line.

New man.

I believed it for about three weeks.

You don't walk out of a psych ward healed.

You walk out raw.

The alarms don't reset just because the paperwork says discharge.

The wiring doesn't change because somebody decides you're safe enough to leave.

The only difference was that now I was supposed to carry it without the chemical buffer.

No weed.

No haze.

No easy off switch.

Just me and the fire.

Then the migraine came back.

Blinding.

The kind that makes you bargain with the ceiling.

I knew where the pills were.

I told myself it was just this once.

Just to function.

Just to get through work.

Just to quiet the pain.

"Just this once" is how dependency takes root.

Not with a party.

Not with rebellion.

Not with some dramatic movie scene.

With a Tuesday.

A ten-hour shift on the line.

Grease on my hands.

Sweat in my eyes.

A hydrocodone in my palm that turned the volume down from screaming to hum.

I didn't feel high.

I felt normal.

That's the trap.

Normal is the most addictive state you'll ever chase when your baseline is panic.

By nineteen, I wasn't using to escape.

I was using to operate.

Tylenol 3s.

Darvocets.

Whatever I could source.

I learned the math of maintenance.

How many milligrams got me through a double.

How to split a pill to stretch it.

How to keep my voice steady when my pupils pinned and my hands shook.

How to smile when my brain was counting hours until the next dose.

I wasn't living.

I was running a machine on borrowed fuel.

The outside looked like a man holding it together.

I showed up.

I worked.

I nodded through conversations.

I did what had to be done.

But every interaction was filtered through chemical equilibrium.

I'd smile while my nervous system ran on fumes.

I'd make plans while my brain calculated supply.

I'd talk like I was present while half of me was already scanning for the next way to stay functional.

Pain wasn't a warning anymore.

It was the baseline.

The pills weren't recreation.

They were infrastructure.

That's hard for people to understand unless they've lived inside a body that never felt safe.

People think addiction starts with chasing pleasure.

Sometimes it does.

But mine started with chasing relief.

Then relief became function.

Then function became survival.

Then survival became dependency.

And once dependency has roots, it doesn't ask permission to grow.

I got good at it.

Too good.

The better I performed, the deeper the dependency sank.

That's another part people miss.

Sometimes addiction hides behind competence.

Sometimes the more useful you look, the worse it is underneath.

I could work.

I could grind.

I could take pressure.

I could handle long shifts.

I could be the guy who showed up and got it done.

That made it easier to lie to myself.

See?

I'm in control.

I wasn't.

I was just pacing myself inside a cage I had built bolt by bolt.

Every relapse wasn't a moral failure.

It was a nervous system demanding equilibrium it couldn't generate on its own.

I didn't know that language then.

I didn't know about dysregulation.

I didn't know about trauma responses.

I didn't know about self-medication.

I didn't know my body was trying to solve an old problem with whatever tool was closest.

I just knew the silence the pills bought.

And how expensive it got over time.

The town felt smaller.

The options thinner.

Everybody knew somebody.

Everybody had an opinion.

Everybody had a version of your story before you even told it.

I wasn't looking for love.

Not really.

I was looking for an anchor.

Someone to tether me to the surface when the internal current tried to drag me under.

I didn't know it then, but I was already building the structure.

I just hadn't met the lock yet.

Then came the steakhouse.

The dish pit.

The bet.

A stupid bet.

The kind boys make when they think life is a game and consequences are something that happen to older people.

I thought I was playing.

I didn't know I was stepping into a pattern that would own the next twenty years.

I thought I was choosing a girl.

I was choosing the next place to hide.

That's the thing about pain.

It doesn't announce itself as a life sentence.

It moves in quietly.

Takes up a chair.

Learns your routines.

Figures out where you keep the spare key.

By the time you realize it's never leaving, you're already paying rent.

And I was already packed.

PART II

Parties.

Friends' houses.

Wherever I went, somebody would come get me.

She's outside.

Drunk.

Determined.

Three months in, she dropped the bomb.

Pregnant.

My gut knew this wasn't love.

But it was responsibility.

My kid deserved better than what I'd grown up with. So I went into overdrive.

Two jobs.

Grinding until I had us a paid-off trailer and a car with no payments.

Trying to build something stable on top of a fault line.

On August 10, 2002, Maverick was born.

My first child.

My son.

We were still in Clarksville, trying to become a family before we even knew how to become adults.

Not even a year later, on June 7, 2003, Shayla came into the world.

Only after Shayla was born did we move to Little Rock, where I juggled college and full-time work, trying to build something solid with two kids already here and a nervous system I didn't understand.

The next twenty years ran on a permanent loop.

Break up.

Crash back together.

Love twisted with wreckage.

Over and over.

Even when we were apart, it never stopped burning.

Trinity learned where my soft spots were.

The kids became weapons.

Step out of line, and she'd threaten to kick me out.

The thought of losing them was pure terror.

Not sadness.

Terror.

Another abandonment my nervous system couldn't survive.

I tried to leave.

Tried to set boundaries.

Tried to stand up.

I always came back.

For them.

Never for her.

That distinction matters.

The cycle never broke.

One day, my oldest daughter—maybe sixteen—looked me dead in the eye and asked:

“Why do you let Mom be so mean to you? Why don't you find someone nicer?”

That shattered me.

I thought I'd hidden the damage.

Turns out kids see everything.

They see what you swallow.

They see what you excuse.

They see the way your shoulders drop when somebody walks in the room.

They see the silence after the insult.

They see the man you become trying to keep peace.

I already had demons, but that relationship made me small.

Any time I hurt—grief, stress, the weight of existing—it got turned back on me.

“You think you're suffering? Try being me.” “Be a man.”

“Most people grow up.”

“It’s all in your head.”

“You’re obsessing and making something that’s not there.”

There was no comfort.

No curiosity.

Just my pain reframed as selfishness.

Any time in that twenty-year marriage that I tried to explain what I was feeling, she’d start talking about how she had it worse.

I’d open my mouth to say, “I’m not okay,” and end up listening to a monologue about her stress, her struggles, her life.

My feelings never got answered.

They got erased.

Then came the verdict:

I was selfish.

I only thought about myself.

You hear that long enough, it sinks into your bones.

At the time, I didn’t know a damn thing about Complex PTSD.

I didn’t know what a nervous system was.

I didn’t know what hypervigilance meant.

I didn’t know freeze could look like failure.

I didn’t know fawning could look like love.

I didn’t know dissociation could look like not caring.

All I knew was that being around people felt like too much and my body was constantly on edge.

So I called it social anxiety because that was the only label I had.

I thought I was weak.

Broken.

Needy.

I thought the problem was me.

When I relapsed, she didn't help.

She punished.

Kicked me out.

Weaponized the kids.

I learned fast:

Don't bring pain here.

That kind of rejection doesn't just hurt.

It rewires you.

Maybe that's why I drank the way I did.

Or maybe that was just the lie I told myself to keep from screaming.

Looking back now, with therapy and brutal self-examination behind me, I can see what I couldn't then.

At the time, I only saw her control.

Her cruelty.

My weakness for staying.

I didn't know my nervous system had been wired for constant alarm since infancy.

Through NICU trauma.

Childhood chaos.

Loss after loss.

Twenty years of static.

I was living with undiagnosed C-PTSD and no language for why everything felt like a threat.

In 2020, Trinity was working as a nurse, so I went to her doctor, a woman she trusted.

Trinity told her I was bipolar.

I didn't correct it.

At the time, I was hiding a meth addiction.

I assumed the chaos in my head was chemical.

Self-inflicted.

Mood swings.

Agitation.

Crashes.

I thought it was the drugs.

So I stayed quiet.

The diagnosis stuck.

Bipolar.

Depression.

Medications stacked up.

Blood pressure.

Cholesterol.

Vitamin D.

Testosterone shots.

B12.

Metformin.

I became a walking pharmacy, treating symptoms while the real wound kept bleeding.

For years, I believed the story we were all telling:

My addiction was the problem.

A character flaw.

Something broken in me.

I didn't know then that substances weren't the disease.

They were my desperate attempt to regulate a nervous system stuck in constant alarm.

And when the labels from outside weren't enough, I went hunting for worse ones myself.

I started reading about Borderline Personality Disorder.

On paper, it fit too well.

Emotional chaos.

Relationship wreckage.

Shame.

Fear of abandonment.

The way every conflict felt like the end of the world.

I didn't have anyone giving me a better map, so I grabbed that one.

I self-diagnosed as borderline and carried that like a guilty verdict for over a year.

I wasn't saying "poor me."

I was saying:

If this is what I am, at least now I know why I ruin everything.

Meanwhile, agoraphobia was closing in like a vise.

Walking outside felt like stepping into incoming fire.

Going to the mailbox might as well have been walking into a riot. My chest would tighten at the thought of leaving the house.

My whole system went on red alert just stepping toward the door.

That's when I finally reached out and got a therapist on the line.

Two minutes into our first conversation, she cut through years of noise.

"You don't have BPD," she said. "You have Complex PTSD. And you've been manipulated."

Just like that.

One sentence, and the floor shifted.

She explained that C-PTSD gets mistaken for BPD all the time.

From the outside, trauma-wired behavior looks like instability.

Like personality problems.

People see the outbursts.

The shutdowns.

The panic.

The relationship chaos.

They don't see the blueprint underneath.

The NICU.

The violence.

The losses.

The twenty years of static.

Under all that mess, she said, I didn't have a broken personality.

I had a trauma injury.

That word—manipulated—hit harder than the diagnosis.

Because suddenly, my whole marriage snapped into focus.

The one-upping every time I tried to talk about my pain.

The “you’re selfish, you only think about yourself.”

The “be a man, most people grow up.”

The “it’s all in your head, you’re making something that’s not there.”

The way I ended up believing I was the monster in every room.

I had spent years calling myself every ugly name I could find when the truth was simpler and sharper:

I’d been hurt, invalidated, and gaslit until I turned the knife on myself.

Eventually, even Trinity’s family turned on the chaos.

After one separation, they gave her an ultimatum:

“Take him back, or we’re done helping you.”

She took me back.

But in secret.

For a year, I stayed silent when her family called.

When they visited, I hid in closets.

Literally.

A grown man hiding in closets in his own house.

Becoming invisible, just like I’d learned as a kid.

She kept me blocked on Facebook.

Status set to single.

Refusing to acknowledge our marriage publicly.

We were legally married with four kids.

And I was hiding in closets.

That wasn't symbolism.

That was embodiment.

My nervous system finally had a physical shape for how I felt inside.

Hidden.

Unwanted.

Useful only when quiet.

Present only when convenient.

Her refrain—"I'm tired of raising you like a child"—drove the shame deeper.

My fawn response, perfected early, convinced me that erasing myself was the only way to keep any kind of peace.

I distrusted my own perceptions, which made her gaslighting—intentional or not—devastatingly effective.

Those moments in closets weren't some metaphor a therapist cooked up.

They were literal.

Proof that my existence felt like something that needed to be hidden.

In 2015, it all collapsed.

Trinity and my mother tag-teamed me into court-ordered rehab for twenty-one days.

The stated reason was concern.

The real reason was control.

I was trying to leave town with another woman they didn't approve of.

The counselor saw it immediately.

"You'll relapse," he said. "You're not here by choice. Pain with desperate coping mechanisms attached. I see it all the time."

He wasn't wrong.

I kicked daily opiates.

Spent six months on Suboxone.

Quit that too.

The pain stayed.

So I switched weapons.

From 2015 to 2021, meth became my escape.

Sometimes injected.

Sometimes traded for alcohol depending on which demon showed up first.

People like to say I chose drugs over my family.

From the outside, it's a clean story.

From the inside, it's a lie.

I didn't stand there calmly choosing between a meth pipe and my kids like two items on a menu.

I chose, over and over, not to implode under a level of pain and shame that never shut off.

I chose the only thing I'd found that could slam the volume down in my head long enough to make it through another night.

It hurt them.

It hurt me.

It wrecked trust and burned bridges I may never fully rebuild.

I own that.

But underneath, the engine wasn't lack of love.

It was a nervous system stuck in survival mode, grabbing whatever would stop the screaming inside my own skull for a few hours.

It was a body that had learned, from incubators and beatings and funerals and twenty years of static, that nobody was coming.

I didn't choose drugs over my family.

I chose not to die, with the only shitty tools I had.

I wasn't healing.

I was surviving.

CHAPTER 4 REFLECTION

The Static Beneath the Storm

For twenty years, I thought I was fighting a relationship.

I wasn't.

I was fighting a nervous system locked in survival mode.

The freezing, dissociation, and desperate need to disappear weren't character flaws or side effects of being an addict.

They were trauma responses.

Echoes of a six-year-old under a blanket.

Echoes of a baby behind glass.

Echoes of a grown man hiding in closets in his own house.

I didn't know why my body shut down under pressure.

I didn't know why conflict felt lethal.

I didn't know why walking into a store could feel like walking into a firing line.

I thought I was lazy.

Selfish.

Weak.

Maybe borderline.

Maybe bipolar.

Whatever label hurt the most.

Therapy finally gave me the language to understand what had always been there:

Complex PTSD.

Manipulation.

CHAPTER 5

A brain and body that had been on danger since birth.

Understanding this hasn't erased the damage.

It hasn't returned the years.

It hasn't repaired every bridge.

It hasn't made me innocent.

But it gave me something I never had before:

A map.

The static in my head wasn't proof of brokenness.

It was proof of survival.

And survival, left unhealed, can look a lot like destruction.

THE COLLAPSE

By 2020, the fire had eaten everything.

Not all at once.

That would have been cleaner.

It would be easier to explain if there had been one big explosion. One final fight. One dramatic moment where the whole structure went up in flames and everybody could point at the smoke and say, There. That's when it happened.

But collapse doesn't always work like that.

Sometimes it's quiet.

Structural.

A beam rots behind the wall.

Then another.

Then another.

The house still looks standing from the road.

Then one day, the floor gives out.

That was me.

Standing from the road.

Gone underneath.

Trinity took the kids—Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, Adalee—and left the four-bedroom house hollow.

A house built for noise suddenly had none.

No footsteps.

No doors opening.

No kids moving through rooms.

No normal chaos.

Just space.

Too much space.

I couldn't afford it alone.

Didn't need the space anyway.

So I moved in with a buddy, mattress on his floor, my life compressed down to whatever fit beside it.

Clothes.

Phone.

A pipe.

That was the size of my world.

The meth stayed within reach.

Always.

Not because I was partying.

Not because I was chasing some wild good time.

Because without it, my skin crawled like something was trying to get out of me.

My teeth chattered.

My chest buzzed.

My brain screamed.

Smoke kept me upright.

Barely.

What started around September 2020 hardened into a pattern.

Daily use.

Broken only by short, fragile attempts at sobriety that never lasted more than a couple weeks.

Long enough to prove I wanted better.

Not long enough to survive without the thing holding me together.

That's the cruelty of it.

People see the relapse and say you didn't want it bad enough.

They don't see the nervous system underneath it.

They don't see what it feels like when your body has no brake pedal and the only thing that slows the machine is also the thing destroying it.

I hadn't taken psychiatric medication since before COVID.

I quit all of it abruptly, around the same time everything else fell apart.

Blood pressure meds.

Depression meds.

Whatever else they had stacked on me.

I told myself I was managing.

That was a lie.

But sometimes lies are the only scaffolding you have left.

I was not managing.

I was disintegrating with a schedule.

Then December 2021 punched through whatever illusion I had left.

Mom was in the living room.

I was in my old bedroom with friends.

Laughter sharp.

Meth humming through the walls.

The kind of scene that looks stupid and ugly from the outside because it was.

But inside it, I was just trying not to feel the house collapsing around me.

Then Mom called out.

“Guys, I don’t feel right.”

Quiet at first.

Then louder.

“I’m dizzy. I’m gonna fall.”

Falon moved fast.

Door flying open.

Shouting for help.

Everything started moving at once.

And I froze.

Not metaphorically.

Not emotionally.

Physically.

Exactly like I had under that blanket as a kid.

My body locked while my mind went blank.

People yelled my name.

“Bret, move.”

I couldn't.

That is the part nobody understands unless they have lived inside freeze.

Your brain can know something is wrong.

Your heart can be screaming.

Your body can still refuse to move.

It is not choice.

It is a breaker tripping.

It is the system shutting down because danger got too big and too fast.

Mom was on the floor.

Falon grabbed her.

Tina called 911.

The living room filled with paramedics.

My body was there.

I was not fully in it.

My sister asked, “Who am I?”

Mom said, “Paula.”

Naming her dead sister.

Her blood sugar was over 600.

“She won't make it,” someone said.

Three days later, her heart stopped in her sleep.

Just like that, another name got carved into the list.

Another part of the world disappeared.

Another piece of me went quiet.

At the visitation, Walter drove.

Truck door opened.

The crowd closed in.

I choked.

Sobs stuck somewhere behind my ribs, not coming out right, not moving through me, just lodged there like broken glass.

On the day of the funeral, I stayed in her house alone.

Her perfume still clinging to a scarf.

That smell gutted me worse than the casket.

Walter called.

“Where are you?”

“Not going,” I said.

His sister dragged me anyway.

We got to the graveside mid-service.

Thirty yards from the casket, I stopped.

Boots planted.

Dirt still raw.

Voices low.

People turned.

They told me to sit up front.

“No.”

That was all I had.

No.

I couldn't make my body walk closer.

I couldn't make grief behave.

I couldn't perform the correct version of a son at his mother's funeral.

Meth buzzing.

Too far gone to feel it right.

Too overwhelmed to feel it clean.

My brother was dead at thirty-two.

Now my mom.

Loss stacked on loss until I couldn't tell where grief ended and numbness began.

That's what people don't understand about grief when trauma is already in the room.

It doesn't come in one wave.

It piles.

It overlaps.

It echoes.

One death pulls ten others up with it.

One funeral becomes every funeral.

One casket becomes every name.

And your body stops knowing which loss it is grieving.

I had tried rehab before.

In 2019, I walked out after two weeks.

My first call was from Trinity.

Bills.

Kids.

Stress.

Life.

I thought leaving was what she wanted.

Later she said it wasn't.

That was the pattern too.

I could never find the right answer.

Stay and fail.

Leave and fail.

Try and fail.

Explain and fail.

Shut up and still fail.

In 2024, I checked myself in again.

Three days later, I was medically discharged.

Sleep apnea.

No CPAP.

Another failed attempt.

Another file somewhere that probably made me look noncompliant.

Another clean little system word for a messy human collapse.

By then, I wasn't fighting to get better.

Not really.

I was fighting to stay conscious.

Fighting to keep my head above a flood I couldn't name yet.

The collapse wasn't dramatic.

It wasn't loud.

It was quiet.

CHAPTER 6

Structural.

Complete.

Everything that had been holding me upright was gone.

The marriage.

The house.

The kids under the same roof.

The belief that work could save me.

The belief that substances could save me.

The belief that I could outrun grief.

The belief that I could keep calling survival a plan.

All gone.

And underneath it all was the same old alarm.

Still screaming.

Still looking for danger.

Still trying to keep me alive.

Even while everything I did to survive kept burning the world down around me.

THE BREAKING POINT

GARRETT'S LOSS

Let me take you back to 2011.

Because the collapse in 2020 did not come from nowhere.

Fire spreads.

It finds old wood.

It finds dry places.

It finds the parts of the house that had already been weakened.

Garrett's death was one of those places.

One of the first major cracks in a dam that had been taking pressure for years.

The external storm of my childhood had passed by then, or at least that's what it looked like from the outside.

I was grown.

I had kids.

A house.

A life that at least looked contained.

But inside, the fire still burned.

Fueled by untreated pain.

Avoidance.

Substance use.

Fragile compromises.

The kind of stability that only works as long as nobody touches the load-bearing wound. Friday, June 24, 2011.

Arkansas summer heat pressed thick against everything.

Greg's mom picked me up in Clarksville.

We were heading to Fayetteville to meet Greg, then on to Kansas City to help his girlfriend Beth move.

A three-story house.

Just Greg and me.

Heavy work.

Sweat work.

The kind of work I understood.

Right before she arrived, I was in the bathroom at my parents' house, trying to take a shit.

Someone started pounding on the door.

"Open up!" Garrett yelled.

"I'm taking a shit!" I snapped back, annoyed.

The pounding got louder.

"Open the door, man—you'll be happy! I've got a surprise for you."

I opened it, still half-seated on the toilet.

Garrett stood there.

Eyes too intense.

Something frantic flickering behind them.

Before I could react, he grabbed my arm.

Found the familiar vein.

The tired one.

And slid a needle in.

Just as fast, he pulled it out.

“See?” he said.

Challenging.

Pleading.

Then he walked out of the bathroom.

Out of the house.

I never saw him alive again.

Garrett.

William Garrett Lingar.

Thirty-two.

Wild.

Unmoored.

Always looking over his shoulder.

Warrants.

Chaos.

Late nights.

A mirror I didn't want to look into.

I envied his freedom.

I think he envied the structure I had.

Kids.

A house.

A life that at least looked like it had walls around it.

That morning, he mentioned wanting to come along.

But I didn't wake him when we left.

I didn't go back to his room.

I didn't make a decision.

That's the part that eats at you.

It wasn't a big choice.

It wasn't some dramatic betrayal.

It was a nothing choice.

A non-decision.

One I would replay for the rest of my life.

Halfway up the highway, my phone rang.

Garrett's voice was pure rage.

"What the fuck, dude? Greg's a cop—I would've ridden with him! You knew I wanted to go!"

Before I could answer, the line went dead.

That was the last time I heard his voice.

Angry.

Hurt.

Alive.

Later, the pieces came together.

He took my dad's Xterra.

Drove to his girlfriend's place looking for his meds.

She said she didn't have them.

He called the cops.

Panic escalated.

Then she called them back and accused him of rape.

They questioned him for hours.

Let him go.

But by then, he was unraveling.

That night, he bought cheap beer.

Drank.

Drove.

Around 10 p.m., on Brick Plant Road, he lost control.

Ninety miles an hour into a tree.

The impact threw the headlights fifty yards from the wreck.

Garrett died instantly.

Saturday morning in Kansas City felt normal until it didn't.

That's how death moves.

The world keeps acting like itself right before it stops being the same world.

I was leaning against the U-Haul in Beth's driveway when Greg came out, face tight.

He handed me his phone.

It was Trinity.

"Garrett's gone," she sobbed. "He's dead. There was a wreck."

The world stopped.

Not slowed.

Stopped.

I stumbled away, through the screen door, out onto the lawn.

Collapsed.

Punched the ground until my arms screamed.

I needed something solid to hit because nothing inside me had shape anymore. I looked up at the sky and screamed:

“Fuck you, God. Fuck you.”

The guilt hit immediately.

Not later.

Not after processing.

Immediately.

If I'd woken him up.

If I hadn't left.

If I had gone back to his room.

If I had answered better.

If I had done one tiny thing different.

Maybe he'd still be alive.

That is what guilt does after trauma.

It turns grief into math.

It creates equations with no answers.

It makes you believe you can solve death backward.

It tells you if you can find the right mistake, maybe you can make the loss make sense.

But all it really does is hand you a knife and teach you to keep turning it.

Garrett's death didn't feel like grief at first.

It felt like proof.

Proof that I was dangerous to the people I loved.

Proof that being close to me led to wreckage.

Proof that I should have known.

Proof that somehow, even when I did nothing, I still caused harm.

That kind of guilt doesn't just hurt.

It attaches itself to identity.

Beth's mother watched quietly from the porch swing.

When I looked up, she opened her arms.

No speech.

No explanation.

No trying to fix it.

Just arms.

I collapsed into her, sobbing, snot and tears soaking her shirt.

She didn't say a word.

She just held me.

I didn't know it then, but that was co-regulation before I had the language.

A steady nervous system meeting a shattered one.

No advice.

No shame.

Just presence.

That night, we went to a Royals-Cubs game.

I thought distraction might help.

Forty thousand fans roared around me.

Hotdogs.

Lights.

Noise.

Movement.

Life continuing like mine hadn't just been ripped open.

I felt nothing.

The only thing my brain could lock onto was the green of the grass.

Unnaturally vivid.

Impossibly calm.

Like my mind had picked one safe color and clung to it while everything else blurred.

A couple days later, back in Arkansas, grief finally crushed me.

Lying beside Trinity, the sobs came hard and uncontrollable.

Not pretty crying.

Not quiet tears.

A body breaking open.

Shaking the mattress.

Garrett was gone.

My brother was gone.

That final phone call was now permanent.

The non-decision was permanent.

The guilt was permanent.

Or at least it felt that way.

Then Trinity said:

“Shut up. I have work tomorrow.”

Something inside me broke that night.

Not because she caused Garrett’s death.

Not because one sentence created all the damage.

But because in my deepest pain, I reached for comfort and found a wall.

Worse than a wall.

A dismissal.

My grief was inconvenient.

My sobbing was annoying.

My pain needed to keep the volume down because somebody had work. That does something to a man.

Especially a man already wired to believe his needs are dangerous.

Especially a man already trained to stay quiet.

Especially a man who learned under a blanket that sound can bring danger.

So I swallowed it.

Not all at once.

But enough.

I learned another lesson.

Don’t bring grief here.

Don’t bring pain here.

Don’t need too loudly.

Don’t fall apart where people can hear you.

At the time, I thought Garrett's death—and her response—was the lowest point of my life.

I didn't understand yet that it was just the first major crack in a dam weakened by decades of storms.

The flood was still coming.

And when it came, it would carry everything with it.

The grief.

The addiction.

The shame.

The marriage.

The kids.

The court dates.

The body that froze.

The man who kept trying to survive with tools that kept killing him.

Garrett's death did not create the fire.

But it poured gasoline on it.

And after that, even the quiet days smelled like smoke.

PART II

I slept on a buddy's floor for a while, my life compressed down to whatever could fit beside a mattress and a pipe.

I needed distance.

A reset.

Somewhere far enough away that the noise might finally stop.

So I went north.

Williston, North Dakota.

Full-time work at Love's Truck Stop.

Cold air.

Long hours.

Structure.

I told myself it was a fresh start.

What I didn't understand yet was that you can't outrun a nervous system.

You just give it new terrain.

The fire came with me.

Work became the next addiction.

It was cleaner.

Legal.

Praised.

I threw myself into it with the same compulsive intensity I had always used to survive.

If I stayed busy, maybe I wouldn't feel the weight of my mother's death in December 2021.

If I stayed moving, maybe the divorce wouldn't catch me.

If I stayed useful, maybe the ache of my kids being gone wouldn't swallow me whole.

Stocking.

Cleaning.

Hauling.

Closing.

Unloading.

Training.

Doing whatever needed done before anybody asked.

For the first six months, they thought I was a miracle.

I worked like five people.

Learned every position.

Took every extra task.

Unloaded trucks.

Dry goods.

Walk-in.

Deep freeze.

Stocked everything.

Cleaned what no one else wanted to touch.

Trained new hires, not because I was promoted, but because I had absorbed everything through sheer, compulsive effort.

The praise came fast.

The raises followed.

For a while, it felt like proof that this time was different.

It never is.

Burnout doesn't announce itself.

It creeps in quietly.

One morning, I was scheduled for a 5 a.m. shift.

I woke to pounding on my apartment window.

Sunlight everywhere.

It was 9 a.m.

Shame hit like a gut punch.

I swore it wouldn't happen again.

The next morning, it did.

Same pounding.

Same time.

Same humiliation.

A week later, I realized my alarm volume had somehow been set to mute.

A simple explanation.

Too late to matter.

I was taken off mornings permanently and put on straight second shifts.

That created its own hell.

We were perpetually short-staffed.

For four solid months, I closed both restaurants alone.

Every dish from two kitchens.

Sweeping and mopping massive floors.

Hauling trash.

Cleaning three deep fryers.

Boxing leftover food.

Doing prep for the next day.

Sometimes it was two in the morning before I left, reeking of grease and exhaustion.

Even then, boundaries didn't exist.

The night manager from the store side—someone I didn't even technically work for—would wander back, see me drowning, and ask me to do extra tasks for him.

Coffee.

Cleaning.

Whatever he didn't want to deal with.

I couldn't say no.

That was the old wiring.

Fawn.

Comply.

Stay useful.

Don't make conflict.

Don't disappoint.

Don't give anyone a reason to turn on you.

The best I could manage was to forget.

Not refuse.

Forget.

Forgetting became the only boundary my nervous system knew how to enforce.

Social anxiety wrapped tighter the longer I stayed.

Walking out of my apartment felt like stepping onto a stage.

Every glance felt like judgment.

Every hallway felt exposed.

Every parking lot felt too open.

I walked the entire perimeter of the building just to enter through the back, avoiding the front entrance.

I took tasks in the back whenever I could.

Customer interaction drained me.

Fluorescent lights buzzed like they were inside my skull.

I was constantly late.

Ten minutes.

Fifteen.

Sometimes thirty.

Not because I didn't care.

Because there was a war in my chest before every shift.

The only jobs where it never happened were the ones where I was in charge.

That mattered.

When I was in charge, my nervous system had a role.

A map.

Authority.

Control.

When I wasn't, every expectation felt like incoming fire.

Every shift felt like walking into someone else's judgment.

When I wasn't working, I disappeared.

I avoided stores unless it was an emergency.

If Love's didn't stock what I needed, I paid someone else to go to Walmart.

When I did go myself, it was at two or three in the morning.

Less people.

Less threat.

A grocery store in daylight felt like an arena.

Aisles too bright.

People too close.

Noise everywhere.

CHAPTER 8

My body scanning exits like I was somewhere dangerous instead of trying to buy bread.

The move north didn't extinguish the fire.

It isolated it.

I was surrounded by people and completely alone.

Sixteen-hour days and solitary closing shifts didn't silence grief or heal loss.

They just proved what I had been running from my whole life.

The storm wasn't outside.

It was in me.

And no matter how far north I went, I carried the weather.

BURNING IN COLD PLACES

After the fire, I didn't cool down.

I just burned differently.

That's what people missed.

They saw North Dakota and thought distance meant change.

They saw a job and thought structure meant healing.

They saw me working hard and thought discipline had replaced destruction.

Hell, even I thought that for a while.

I traded whiskey for work.

Chaos for control.

One addiction for another.

From the outside, it looked like progress.

And maybe part of it was.

But not all progress is freedom.

Sometimes it's just survival wearing cleaner clothes.

I got clean.

I didn't get free.

What people called "getting my life together" was really obsession dressed up as discipline.

Speed.

Precision.

Performance.

A body running on panic and calling it work ethic.

I worked like six people crammed into one exhausted frame.

Not healing.

Hiding.

If I stayed useful, I didn't have to feel useless.

If I stayed moving, grief couldn't catch me.

If I stayed needed, maybe abandonment wouldn't find me.

If I outworked everybody, maybe nobody would see how badly I was falling apart. That was the lie.

And for a while, it worked.

That's the dangerous part.

A bad coping mechanism doesn't always look bad at first.

Sometimes people praise it.

Sometimes they reward it.

Sometimes they give you raises for it.

Sometimes they call it dedication when it's really a nervous system with no off switch.

I couldn't say no.

Not in a normal way.

No felt dangerous.

No felt like conflict.

No felt like disappointing someone.

No felt like giving people a reason to turn cold.

So I said yes.

To extra work.

Extra closing.

Extra cleaning.

Extra pressure.

Extra everything.

I didn't ask for help.

I didn't admit I was drowning.

I just took more weight and called it strength.

That's what fawning looks like when it grows up in a work uniform.

It doesn't always look weak.

Sometimes it looks like the best employee in the building.

The one who stays late.

The one who covers shifts.

The one who learns every position.

The one who says, "I got it," while something inside him is begging somebody to notice he doesn't.

I took everything until I broke.

And even then, I tried to make breaking look useful.

Lateness wasn't laziness.

It was dread.

The paralysis before the door.

The moment where my body refused to move even when my mind begged it to.

People think time is simple.

Alarm goes off.

Get up.

Get dressed.

Go.

That's how it works for a regulated nervous system.

For me, mornings became a battlefield.

Before my feet even hit the floor, my body was already braced.

Chest tight.

Mind fogged.

Skin buzzing.

A sense of doom attached to nothing and everything.

I'd know I needed to move.

I'd know being late would make things worse.

I'd know the shame waiting on the other side.

Still, my body would freeze.

Depression doesn't punch a clock.

Trauma doesn't care about your schedule.

A dysregulated nervous system doesn't become professional because the shift starts at five.

People saw late.

They didn't see war.

They didn't see the body locked behind glass.

They didn't see the man arguing with himself in the dark.

Move.

Get up.

You're going to lose this.

You're doing it again.

Move.

And still nothing.

That kind of failure eats different because you know how it looks.

You know people think you don't care.

You know they think you're unreliable.

You know they're building a story about you.

And part of you believes them.

That's where shame comes in.

Not after the failure.

During it.

Before it.

Shame stands over you while you're already frozen and calls you weak for not moving.
Then when you finally do move, you're not just late.

You're carrying the proof that you're exactly what you feared.

Unreliable.

Broken.

A problem.

That was the loop.

Get the job.

Overperform.

Get praised.

Get overwhelmed.

Crack.

Get punished.

Disappear.

Repeat.

I didn't know how to live without that loop.

It had been running most of my life in different forms.

Relationships.

Jobs.

Addiction.

Court.

Family.

Everything.

At first, I show up like a miracle.

Then the pressure builds.

Then my nervous system starts treating normal expectations like threats.

Then I freeze, fawn, avoid, numb, or explode.

Then everything falls apart.

Then shame says, "See?"

And I start over somewhere else.

That's not a character flaw.

That's a pattern.

But if nobody names the pattern, you just keep thinking you are the problem.

My brain was a fire alarm that never shut off.

Every sound felt invasive.

Every light too bright.

Every voice a threat.

Customer voices.

Manager voices.

Coworker voices.

The beep of machines.

The slam of freezer doors.

The buzz of fluorescent lights.

The clatter of dishes.

The squeak of shoes on greasy floors.

It all stacked.

Most people can filter that stuff out.

Mine couldn't.

My nervous system took everything in like evidence.

A look.

A tone.

A sigh.

A task added too late.

A manager walking toward me.

A customer standing too close.

The body read it all as possible danger.

I didn't know what "regulated" felt like.

I didn't know you were supposed to feel safe inside your own skin. So I performed.

That's what addicts do.

That's what trauma survivors do.

That's what men taught to be quiet do.

Smile.

Joke.

Work.

Act useful.

Act fine.

Act like your chest isn't full of bees.

Act like your soul isn't dragging behind you.

Act like you don't want to crawl out the back door and vanish.

People love the performance.

Until you miss a cue.

Then they act betrayed.

Like the useful version of you was the real one and the collapse was some kind of fraud.

But the collapse was always there.

The performance was the mask.

When I wasn't working, I hid.

Days blurred together.

Phone dark.

Curtains closed.

Apartment silent.

I avoided messages because every notification felt like pressure.

I avoided stores because the world felt too loud.

I avoided people because being perceived felt dangerous.

That's hard to explain.

Being seen felt like exposure.

Like if somebody looked too closely, they would see the whole wreckage.

So I disappeared before anyone could.

Even grocery stores felt like arenas.

I pushed a cart even when I didn't need one.

Just to have something to hold.

Something in front of me.

Something to make my hands look normal.

Something to justify my existence in that space.

A cart became armor.

Aisle by aisle, I'd scan.

Who's looking?

Where's the exit?

How fast can I get out?

Can I make it through self-checkout without someone talking to me?

That isn't shopping.

That's threat management.

And I lived like that every day.

Work.

Hide.

Panic.

Perform.

Collapse.

Repeat.

The colder it got outside, the hotter I burned inside.

North Dakota winters have a way of making isolation feel permanent.

Cold like punishment.

Wind that cuts through clothes and gets into the bones.

Snow piled against buildings.

Gray skies.

Long nights.

I thought maybe the cold would numb me.

It didn't.

It just gave the fire cleaner air.

There were days I looked around and realized I was farther from home than I had ever been and still trapped in the same body.

That realization does something to you.

Because running at least gives hope while you're moving.

You tell yourself:

Once I get there, I'll be different.

Once I leave this town, I'll be different.

Once I get a new job, I'll be different.

Once I'm away from the marriage, I'll be different.

Once I'm away from everybody who knows the old me, I'll be different.

Then you get there.

And there you are.

Same alarm.

Same shame.

Same dread.

Same need to numb.

Same fear of people.

Same body waiting for danger.

That's when you realize geography can't heal what lives in the nervous system.

You can move states.

You can change jobs.

You can change names people call you.

You can change the scenery.

But if the body still believes the war is happening, every new place becomes another battlefield.

That was North Dakota.

A battlefield with better pay.

A battlefield where people praised me before they misunderstood me.

A battlefield where I learned that overworking is just addiction with a timecard.

It was cleaner than meth.

More acceptable than booze.

More respectable than pills.

But it came from the same place.

A desperate need to escape the inside of my own body.

That's why "functioning" can be such a dangerous word.

People say high-functioning like it means you're okay.

Sometimes it just means you're dying in a way that benefits other people.

You show up.

You produce.

You smile.

You carry weight.

You make money.

You help.

You train.

You clean.

You close.

You perform.

And nobody asks what it costs because the machine is useful.

Until it breaks.

Then suddenly the same people who praised your output question your character.

Where did the motivation go?

Why are you late?

Why can't you keep up?

What happened to you?

The answer is simple.

Nothing happened.

The bill came due.

That's what burnout is.

The bill.

All the sleep you skipped.

All the boundaries you didn't set.

All the grief you outran.

All the pain you swallowed.

All the times your body said stop and you answered with more.

Eventually the body collects.

Mine did.

The second shifts.

The isolation.

The late nights.

The constant pressure.

The shame.

The sensory overload.

The grief.

The addiction history.

The loneliness.

All of it piled up.

And I kept telling myself I should be able to handle it.

That word again.

Should.

Should is shame dressed like instruction.

I should be stronger.

I should be better.

I should be over this.

I should be grateful.

I should be able to work like this.

I should be able to answer the phone.

I should be able to walk into Walmart.

I should be able to sleep.

I should be able to stop.

I should be able to be normal.

But should never regulated my nervous system.

It just beat me for being dysregulated.

So I kept burning.

Quietly.

In cold places.

I smiled.

I joked.

I performed.

I became whatever the room needed until I couldn't.

And when I couldn't, I disappeared.

That's the pattern.

That's the machine.

That's what happens when a man spends his whole life trying to survive instead of learning how to live.

I was still on fire.

Just in colder waters.

BRIDGE

TURNING ON THE LIGHT

You've walked through the wreckage with me.

The glass box.

The blanket at six.

The pills at seventeen.

The steakhouse bet.

The twenty years of static.

The closets.

Garrett's last phone call.

My mother on the floor.

The graveside where my boots wouldn't move.

North Dakota at two in the morning, pushing a cart just to feel like I had something to hold onto.

It's heavy.

I know.

I wrote it that way because you don't heal trauma by skipping the fire.

You heal it by walking through it.

Not because pain is holy.

Not because suffering makes you better.

But because the truth has to be faced before it can be understood.

For years, I didn't understand it.

I just kept grabbing whatever would stop the burning.

Pills.

Booze.

Meth.

Work.

Hiding.

Fawning.

Performing.

Disappearing.

All of it was a different way to slam the volume down on a nervous system that never got the all-clear.

At first, I was just trying to figure out how the hell I got here.

How did a three-pound baby in a glass box become a grown man who couldn't feel safe in his own skin?

How did the kid under the blanket become the man hiding in closets?

How did booze, pills, meth, work, isolation, and shame become the tools I reached for just to survive another day?

How did I keep hurting people I loved while trying not to die inside?

How did I keep freezing when life demanded movement?

How did I keep calling it weakness when my body was screaming survival?

For a long time, that was the only question I had.

How?

How did this happen?

How did it get this bad?

How did I lose so much time?

How did I become someone I barely recognized?

But once the smoke started clearing, the question changed.

It wasn't just how anymore.

It was why.

Why did my body treat peace like a setup?

Why did shame feel more believable than love?

Why did chaos feel familiar?

Why did substances feel like rescue?

Why did connection feel like danger?

Why did court dates, phone calls, stores, conflict, grief, and silence all trigger the same internal alarm?

Why did I keep reacting like the past was still happening?

That is where this book turns.

The first half was the journey through the wreckage.

The second half is the autopsy of the fire.

Not to excuse it.

Not to make it pretty.

Not to erase the damage.

But to understand the machinery.

Because you can't rebuild a life if you don't know what kept burning it down.

And I was tired of blaming the smoke.

It was time to find the fuel.

So now I need to stop only telling the story and start mapping it.

Not because I want to sound smart.

Not because I'm trying to distance myself from the pain.

PART IV

CHAPTER 9

DECODING THE FIRE

SHIFTING THE BLAME

Alright.

We've walked through the wreckage.

The glass box.

The blanket.

The pills.

The marriage.

The closets.

The funerals.

North Dakota.

The work.

The hiding.

The fire.

You've seen the storms I weathered. You've felt some of the heat that burned through my life.

Maybe you've smelled the smoke of your own past battles in these pages.

That's the point.

Not to drag you through pain for nothing.

Not to make my life sound worse than yours.

Not to stack trauma like trophies.

But because if you don't walk through the fire first, the wiring won't make sense.

For years, I didn't know what I was looking at.

I saw chaos.

Addiction.

Failed relationships.

Missed court dates.

Panic.

Shame.

Rage.

Freeze.

Isolation.

A life that kept collapsing no matter how many times I tried to rebuild it.

I kept asking the wrong question.

Why am I so fucked up?

That was the question shame gave me.

It sounded logical at the time.

Because everywhere I looked, there was evidence.

I had hurt people.

I had failed my kids.

I had burned bridges.

I had lied.

I had used.

I had disappeared.

I had frozen when I needed to move.

I had chosen the wrong tools over and over.

So the answer felt obvious:

Me.

I was the problem.

Lazy.

Toxic.

Weak.

Selfish.

Crazy.

An addict.

A failure.

A man who couldn't grow up.

A man who kept making himself worse.

That was the story everybody else seemed to understand, so eventually I believed it too.

For years, that why felt like a locked door.

Why the constant chaos?

Why the relentless self-destruction?

Why did connection always feel like walking on shattered glass?

Why did peace feel suspicious?

Why did I keep reaching for substances when I knew what they were costing me?

Why did I feel so fundamentally, permanently broken?

At first, my default setting was to point outward.

The world was fucked up.

Bad luck stacked against me.

Shitty people crossed my path.

Trinity did this.

Kristina did that.

The cops failed here.

The court system failed there.

Family didn't understand.

People judged.

And yeah, plenty of external shit did go sideways.

Spectacularly.

Losing Garrett.

Mom dying.

The betrayal.

The manipulation.

The shame.

The systems that measured compliance without understanding freeze.

Those things were real.

I'm not rewriting them.

I'm not pretending they didn't matter.

But hitting rock bottom wasn't a one-time event for me.

It was a recurring destination.

That forced a brutal admission:

External storms were real.

But the biggest, most destructive fire—the one that kept reigniting no matter how many times I tried to stomp it out—was burning inside me.

Not because I was evil.

Not because I wanted destruction.

Not because I didn't love my kids.

Because my nervous system had been trained to survive, not to live.

That distinction changed everything.

It didn't make me innocent.

It made me understandable.

And for someone drowning in shame, understandable can be the first breath.

The shift did not come all at once.

There was no movie moment.

No sudden light from heaven.

No clean revelation where I dropped the pipe, hugged everybody, and became a brand-new man.

It was slower than that.

Messier.

More humiliating.

It came through late nights lost in research because I was desperate enough to read anything that might explain me.

It came through therapy sessions that felt like pulling teeth without anesthetic.

It came through failed rehab attempts where maybe one sentence managed to stick.

It came through writing this story down and seeing patterns I couldn't see while I was living inside them.

It came through realizing the same reactions kept showing up in different costumes.

Freeze at six under the blanket.

Freeze when Mom hit the floor.

Freeze with court.

Freeze with phone calls.

Freeze at the mailbox.

Fawn in the marriage.

Fawn at work.

Fawn when I hid in closets just to keep peace.

Dissociation in grief.

Dissociation in conflict.

Dissociation when systems demanded clarity from a brain that had gone underwater.

Substances as relief.

Work as relief.

Isolation as relief.

Everything had a pattern.

That mattered.

Because patterns mean machinery.

Patterns mean this wasn't random.

Patterns mean there is something to understand.

Slowly, reluctantly, shapes started emerging from the smoke.

Complex trauma.

Attachment wounds.

Nervous system dysregulation.

Hypervigilance.

Freeze.

Fawn.

Dissociation.

Addiction as regulation.

Shame.

Predictive models.

Co-regulation.

Words I didn't have when I needed them most.

Words that came late.

But late isn't never.

It turns out there's a map to this particular landscape of suffering.

That doesn't make the journey easy.

It doesn't erase the damage.

It doesn't absolve me.

But understanding the terrain is the first step toward finding a different path.

That's what this chapter is about.

Shifting the blame.

Not from me to everyone else.

That would just be another lie.

Not from everyone else to me.

That's the old shame story.

The shift is from moral failure to mechanism.

From "I am broken" to "something happened to my system, and my system adapted."

From "I chose destruction because I didn't care" to "I reached for destructive things because my body was trying to survive."

From "I am the fire" to "I am the man who learned to live inside fire."

There is a difference.

A big one.

Because if I am the fire, then all I can do is hate myself.

But if I learned fire as survival, then maybe I can learn something else.

That doesn't erase accountability.

It makes accountability possible.

Shame says:

You are bad.

Accountability says:

This caused harm. Now what are you going to do with the truth?

Shame collapses.

Accountability moves.

Shame hides.

Accountability looks.

Shame says:

You are beyond repair.

Accountability says:

Start with the next honest step.

For years, I couldn't take that step because I was drowning in the wrong story.

I thought the options were either blame everybody else or blame myself completely.

Both kept me stuck.

Blaming everybody else kept me from seeing my patterns.

Blaming myself completely kept me from surviving the sight of them.

The truth had to be wider than that.

Yes, people hurt me.

Yes, systems failed me.

Yes, I was manipulated.

Yes, trauma shaped my reactions.

Yes, addiction was survival before it became destruction.

And yes, I still caused harm.

All of those can be true in the same body.

That is the hardest part.

Holding both.

The wound and the damage.

The explanation and the responsibility.

The victim and the person who hurt others.

The child under the blanket and the grown man who had to own what came next.

That is where real healing starts.

Not in pretending I had no control.

Not in pretending I had all of it.

In telling the truth about the machinery.

Because before I could even think about rebuilding, I had to understand the original design.

The faulty wiring.

The cracked foundation.

The way the fire kept finding fuel.

And that meant going back.

Way back.

Back to the beginning.

Back to the glass.

Back to the alarms.

Back to the first lesson my body ever learned.

Distance.

Danger.

CHAPTER 10

Survive.

THE GLASS BOX BLUEPRINT

WIRED FOR DISTANCE AND DANGER

Ground zero.

September 1982.

Davenport, Iowa.

This chapter isn't just about remembering the start.

I don't have memory from those first thirty days.

Not the kind you can tell like a story.

No pictures in my head.

No scene I can rewind.

No conscious image of the incubator, the nurses, the wires, the priest, the machines.

But my body remembers.

That's the whole point.

Some memories don't come back as pictures.

They come back as posture.

As breath.

As distance.

As flinching.

As the chest tightening when someone gets too close.

As the skin crawling under fluorescent lights.

As the strange feeling that you are always behind glass, watching life happen on the other side.

They said I was born early.

Seven months.

Three pounds, four ounces.

Very low birth weight.

Dropped into a world I wasn't ready for and placed inside a glass box built to keep me alive.

That part matters.

Because survival was the goal.

Not comfort.

Not bonding.

Not nervous system regulation.

Survival.

And I'm grateful for that.

I am here because somebody kept that tiny body alive.

But survival has a cost when it comes without safety.

The world I entered wasn't arms and heartbeats.

It was acrylic walls.

Alarms.

Bright lights.

Procedures.

Distance.

A sterile kind of care.

The kind that saves the body while the nervous system learns loneliness as baseline.

I'm not saying anyone meant harm.

That's not the point.

The point is that the body doesn't need intention to be shaped by experience.

A baby doesn't understand medical necessity.

A baby doesn't know, "This machine is helping me breathe."

A baby doesn't know, "The nurses are doing their best."

A baby doesn't know, "My parents love me but can't hold me like babies are supposed to be held."

The body just knows sensation.

Separation.

Noise.

Light.

Pain.

Cold.

Hunger.

Touch that comes through gloves.

Connection interrupted by glass.

My first classroom was an incubator.

And the first lesson was distance.

My body learned that survival meant staying still.

Staying quiet.

Not needing too much.

Not taking up space.

Not expecting warmth to arrive when I cried.

That's not poetry.

That's wiring.

Today they know more.

They know skin-to-skin matters.

They know touch matters.

They know pain matters.

They know parental presence matters.

They know a newborn's nervous system is not just a machine to stabilize but a living system being shaped by every signal around it.

But in 1982, things were different.

The medical world was still learning what babies could feel, what trauma could do, what separation could carve into a nervous system that had not even learned language yet.

So I lived.

But I lived through distance first.

And that distance became part of the blueprint.

The Glass Box Blueprint.

That's what I call it.

Not destiny.

Not an excuse.

A blueprint.

A starting design.

A set of fault lines.

A nervous system built on shaky ground before the storms ever hit.

Think of it like a house.

If the foundation is already cracked, a normal storm can do more damage.

A strong storm can level the whole thing.

My life became a series of storms hitting a foundation that never got poured right.
Anxiety.

Sensory overload.

Attachment fear.

Hypervigilance.

Trouble trusting closeness.

Feeling separate even in a room full of people.

Feeling like life was happening through glass.

All of that makes more sense when I look back at the beginning.

The glass box didn't cause everything.

But it taught my system the first language.

Distance.

Danger.

Stay alive.

Then life kept speaking that same language.

At six, under the blanket, the lesson got louder.

Stay still.

Stay quiet.

Don't move.

If you move, you might be next.

At school, the lesson changed clothes.

Crowds are danger.

Eyes are danger.

Noise is danger.

Don't draw attention.

At seventeen, substances translated it again.

This quiets the alarm.

This makes the world tolerable.

This is how you function.

In relationships, the lesson became attachment panic.

Don't leave.

Don't make them mad.

Hide if you have to.

Erase yourself if peace depends on it.

At work, it became performance.

Be useful.

Be needed.

Outwork the shame.

If you are valuable enough, maybe they won't throw you away. That's the blueprint meeting life.

The same first lesson echoing through every room.

Some people grow up with safety as their baseline.

Their nervous system learns:

I can rest.

I can cry and someone comes.

I can need and still be loved.

I can be close and still be safe.

I can make noise and not be punished.

I can exist without earning it.

Mine learned something else.

I can survive if I stay quiet.

I can survive if I don't need much.

I can survive if I keep distance.

I can survive if I notice danger before it notices me.

That is not a personality.

That is adaptation.

But adaptation becomes a cage when the danger changes and the body keeps using the same rules.

That's what happened to me.

The world kept changing.

My body kept using the glass box rules.

Stay small.

Stay alert.

Stay separate.

Stay ready.

And when the storms came, those rules got reinforced.

The domestic violence.

The losses.

The marriage.

The addiction.

The court system.

The shame.

Each one carved the same track deeper.

It became a feedback loop.

Early vulnerability made later trauma hit harder.

Later trauma made the early vulnerability look like proof I was broken.

The more overwhelmed I became, the more I isolated.

The more I isolated, the more unsafe people felt.

The more unsafe people felt, the more I reached for substances.

The more I used substances, the more damage I caused.

The more damage I caused, the more shame I carried.

The more shame I carried, the more my nervous system screamed for relief.

Around and around.

A machine running on broken logic.

For years, I only saw the results.

Anxiety.

Addiction.

Failed relationships.

Social withdrawal.

Court problems.

Freeze.

Fawning.

Depression.

I didn't see the blueprint.

So I blamed the man standing in the wreckage.

Me.

I thought I was the defect.

Now I understand it differently.

I was not born wrong.

I was born fighting.

And the fight left marks.

That doesn't mean I get to blame a glass box for every choice I made.

That would be too easy.

Too simple.

Too dishonest.

But it does mean the beginning mattered.

It means my first environment trained my nervous system before I ever got a vote.

It means the later storms didn't hit neutral ground.

They hit a system already calibrated for danger.

That understanding changed something in me.

Not all at once.

But enough.

It dialed down the self-hatred just a notch.

It helped me look at the baby in the box with compassion instead of disgust.

It helped me see the man who came out of that box not as defective, but as overadapted. Built for survival.

Terrible at peace.

That's the work now.

Not pretending the blueprint doesn't exist.

Not blaming the blueprint for everything.

Learning it.

CHAPTER 11

Reading it.

Seeing where the fault lines are.

And then rebuilding where the foundation cracked.

Because the blueprint is not destiny.

It is a map.

And a map can show you where not to build the same house again.

ECHOES AND AMPLIFIERS

WHEN THE BLUEPRINT MEETS THE STORM

Understanding the Glass Box Blueprint was like finding the architect's plans under the rubble.

Not clean plans.

Not good plans.

Scorched.

Water-stained.

Half torn.

But still readable enough to show me something important:

The house didn't collapse only because the storms were strong.

It collapsed because the foundation was already cracked.

That is not self-pity.

That is structure.

A blueprint alone does not destroy a house.

A storm alone does not always destroy a house.

But a storm hitting fault lines?

That's different.

That's what my life became.

The blueprint created vulnerabilities.

The storms amplified them.

Then the amplified damage made the blueprint feel like truth.

Distance.

Danger.

Everyone leaves.

Needs make you unsafe.

Pain makes you inconvenient.

Connection will fail.

You are too much.

You are alone.

Every storm carved those lessons deeper.

Think back to the six-year-old under the blanket.

The violence was real.

The screams were real.

Mom's fear was real.

The shadow in the doorway was real.

But my body was not meeting that terror as a blank slate.

It was meeting it with a nervous system that had already learned distance, alarm, and helpless stillness.

So the fear didn't just scare me.

It installed itself.

The freeze response made sense.

A small child cannot fight a grown man.

A small child cannot run without becoming visible.

A small child cannot rescue his mother.

So the body chooses what is left.

Freeze.

Stay still.

Stay quiet.

Don't draw attention.

Survive.

That response wasn't weakness.

It was intelligence under threat.

But when the body uses freeze enough times, freeze becomes the default language.

Decades later, the same response showed up when Mom fell.

When court dates hit.

When phone calls came.

When grief got too big.

When conflict got too close.

Different storms.

Same blueprint.

That's what echoes are.

The original sound is gone, but the body keeps hearing it.

The blanket became the courtroom.

The glass box became the closet.

The screams became the tone change.

The danger became anything my nervous system couldn't predict.

By my teens, the blueprint was meeting a different storm.

People.

School.

Crowds.

Noise.

Fluorescent lights.

Hallways packed with bodies.

The world felt too loud, too close, too bright.

I didn't know about sensory sensitivity.

I didn't know trauma could tune the body to pick up everything.

I just knew school felt like a cage and my hands shook.

Other kids walked through halls.

I walked through threat.

That is what happens when the scanner never shuts off.

The brain does not just see people.

It sees risk.

A laugh becomes judgment.

A glance becomes danger.

A whisper becomes proof.

A doorway becomes exposure.

A classroom becomes a trap.

So I left.

Got the GED.

Called it work.

Called it money.

Called it independence.

But underneath, it was escape.

The blueprint said:

Get out before the room swallows you.

Then alcohol showed up like relief.

Not rebellion.

Relief.

The first time booze softened the edges, it taught my nervous system something powerful:

There is a way to turn the volume down.

That was dangerous knowledge.

Same with pills.

A migraine hit.

A hydro quieted it.

Suddenly I felt normal.

Not euphoric.

Normal.

That's the most addictive thing in the world when your baseline is alarm. Normal.

A body wired for danger will reach for whatever gives it a few hours of peace.

That is why addiction was not random.

It was the blueprint meeting the storm of a body that could not regulate itself.

Substances became an amplifier too.

They quieted pain at first.

Then they created more pain.

They lowered the alarm for a while.

Then they made the alarm louder when they wore off.

They helped me function.

Then they stole function.

They were rescue.

Then wreckage.

That's how the fire spreads.

Relationships became the biggest collision point.

Because the blueprint was built around distance, but my heart still wanted connection.

That's the contradiction.

The nervous system feared closeness.

The soul craved it.

So love became threat management.

I didn't know how to simply be close.

I knew how to scan.

Perform.

Please.

Cling.

Withdraw.

Fawn.

Hide.

Endure.

I knew how to read a room for danger.

I did not know how to read a room for safety.

With Trinity, the fear of abandonment was not just emotional.

It felt like survival.

When the kids were used as leverage, it hit the deepest wire in me.

Connection could disappear.

Family could vanish.

Love could become a weapon.

So I stayed.

Not because staying was healthy.

Not because the marriage was safe.

Because my nervous system believed leaving meant losing everything.

Hiding in closets was not symbolism.

It was the blueprint given a body.

Your needs are dangerous.

Your presence causes problems.

Disappear.

That is glass box logic.

That is blanket logic.

That is trauma logic.

And it made sense to the part of me still trying to survive.

Then Garrett died.

Another storm.

Not just loss.

Confirmation.

People die.

The worst happens.

You should have known.

You should have stopped it.

You are dangerous to the people you love.

Guilt became an amplifier.

It took grief and turned it into identity.

Not "I lost my brother."

"I failed my brother."

Not "I am hurting."

"I am the reason people get hurt."

That kind of guilt does not stay in one room.

It follows you everywhere.

It contaminates fatherhood.

Marriage.

Work.

Sobriety.

Faith.

Every future mistake becomes connected to the original wound.

See?

You hurt people.

See?

You ruin things.

See?

You should have known better.

Then Mom died.

Another storm.

Another freeze.

Another failure in my own eyes.

Another moment where my body did what it was trained to do and my shame called it proof.

Freeze under the blanket.

Freeze in the living room.

Freeze at the graveside.

The storm kept changing.

The body kept responding to the old script.

North Dakota was supposed to be escape.

It became amplification.

Distance isolated the fire.

Work praised the dysregulation.

The cold gave the loneliness shape.

The job rewarded overperformance until overperformance became burnout. I thought I had found structure.

What I found was a cleaner place to hide.

That is how trauma tricks you.

It lets you change the scenery while the machine keeps running the same program.

Get away.

Start over.

Work harder.

Be useful.

Don't feel.

Don't need.

Don't stop.

Then crack.

Disappear.

Repeat.

The blueprint kept meeting storms.

And the storms kept proving the blueprint right.

Connection is unsafe.

Rest is unsafe.

Needs are unsafe.

Stillness is unsafe.

Authority is unsafe.

People are unsafe.

Your body is unsafe.

You are unsafe.

That is the loop.

A self-fulfilling prophecy built out of survival data.

When you expect abandonment, you panic.

When you panic, you cling, rage, hide, use, or shut down.

When you do that, people leave.

When people leave, the blueprint says:

See?

I told you.

When you expect judgment, you avoid.

When you avoid, you miss the appointment, court date, phone call, or conversation.

When you miss it, consequences hit.

When consequences hit, the blueprint says:

See?

The world is dangerous.

When you expect shame, you hide.

When you hide, problems grow.

When problems grow, shame gets louder.

When shame gets louder, the blueprint says:

See?

You are the problem.

That is what I mean by echoes and amplifiers.

The early wiring echoed through every later wound.

Every later wound amplified the early wiring.

Back and forth.

Storm feeding blueprint.

Blueprint shaping storm.

Until I couldn't tell where one ended and the other began.

Seeing that doesn't undo the damage.

It does not give me back the years.

It does not make me innocent.

But it gives me targets.

Not vague ones.

Real ones.

The hypersensitive alarm system.

The freeze response.

The fawn response.

The attachment panic.

The shame loop.

The substance-as-regulation pattern.

The way my body treats pressure like danger.

The way my mind turns grief into guilt.

The way I disappear when I need help most.

Those are not excuses.

They are repair sites.

You can't fix "I'm just fucked up."

There is no treatment plan for self-hatred.

But you can work with freeze.

You can work with shame.

You can work with addiction.

You can work with attachment wounds.

You can work with nervous system dysregulation.

You can work with a body that never got the all-clear.

CHAPTER 12

That's the difference.

The storms were real.

The blueprint was real.

The damage was real.

But the story that I was simply born defective?

That was never real.

That was smoke.

And now I can see the fuel.

THE ANATOMY OF TRAUMA

60 REFLECTIONS FROM THE INSIDE

You don't heal trauma by out-talking it.

You heal it by out-seeing it.

That's what this chapter is.

Sixty fragments pulled from the ash.

No polish.

No apology.

Just the mechanics, laid bare.

Not to sound clinical.

Not to turn my life into a textbook.

To name the things that almost killed me before I had language for them.

Because shame thrives in silence.

Trauma thrives in silence.

Addiction thrives in silence.

And I fed all three for decades.

So here are the pieces.

The wires.

The reflexes.

The survival codes.

The truths I had to drag out of the fire one by one.

1. Survival doesn't ask permission. It rewires you in the dark.

2. The NICU didn't just keep me alive. It taught my nervous system that connection could mean wires, alarms, glass, and distance.

1. Freeze isn't cowardice. It's biology hitting the brakes when flight isn't possible and fight would get you hurt.

1. Shame thrives in silence. The longer it stays unnamed, the more it starts sounding like truth.

1. You don't choose addiction the way people think. You choose the nearest thing that turns down the volume.

1. The brain doesn't store trauma only as memory. It stores it as threat protocol.
2. Hiding in closets wasn't symbolism. It was embodiment. My nervous system finally had a physical shape for how I felt inside.

1. Grief isn't a wave. It's a tide. It pulls out, leaves wreckage, and comes back heavier.
2. Meth didn't make me reckless at first. It made me functional enough to pretend I was okay.

10.The legal system measures compliance. Trauma measures survival. They speak different languages.

11.Missing court wasn't always defiance. Sometimes it was a nervous system locked in a room it couldn't find the door to.

12.You can't outperform a dysregulated nervous system. You just exhaust it faster.

13.Love bombing isn't love. It's a nervous system hack.

14. Gaslighting doesn't just break trust in another person. It breaks trust in your own data.

15. I didn't lose my kids to drugs alone. I lost them to a cascade of unregulated survival responses that drugs made worse.

16. The body keeps receipts even when the mind loses the paperwork.

17. Catastrophizing isn't always paranoia. Sometimes it's pattern recognition from a life where the worst really did keep happening.

18. You don't heal by fixing the past. You heal by upgrading the present wiring.

19. Addiction is a short-term regulator with long-term collateral damage.

20. Fawning isn't people-pleasing. It's threat mitigation disguised as compliance.

21. The first time I said no to a dose, my hands shook. The tenth time, my jaw clenched. The hundredth time, I just breathed.

22. Trauma doesn't care about your intentions. It cares about your nervous system's baseline.

23. I thought I was bipolar. I was drowning in unmetabolized stress.

24. You can't logic your way out of a physiological state. You have to regulate your way out.

25. Sleep paralysis isn't a dream. It's the body's brake pedal stuck while the mind is already awake.

26. The screams at night weren't madness. They were the nervous system blowing a pressure valve.

27. Isolation feels like safety until you realize it's just a slower bleed.

28. Work became my new pipe. Cleaner. Legal. Praised. Still an escape.

29.Overperforming isn't discipline. Sometimes it's panic wearing a uniform.

30.Burnout doesn't announce itself. It just stops showing up one morning.

31.I didn't need more motivation. I needed a nervous system that didn't treat a Tuesday like a threat.

32.The mirror lies when shame is in the room. It shows you a monster instead of a man trying to survive.

33.You don't break cycles by wishing. You break them by interrupting the reflex.

34.Forgiveness isn't pretending nothing happened. It's dropping the hot coal so you can use your hands again.

35.I didn't fail my kids because I didn't love them. I failed them because I didn't know how to stay regulated while loving them.

36.Accountability isn't self-flagellation. It's looking at the wreckage and saying, "I helped build this. Now I have to help rebuild it."

37.Trauma responses aren't flaws. They're outdated software running on modern hardware.

38.You don't outrun your nervous system. You just give it new terrain to panic on.

39.Legal freeze wasn't a choice. It was a system collision: court demands meeting biology shutting down.

40.I stopped asking, "Why am I like this?" and started asking, "What was this designed to survive?"

- 41.The fire didn't destroy me. It revealed what was flammable.
- 42.Healing isn't linear. It's a spiral. You pass the same wound with better tools.
- 43.You can't regulate through willpower alone. You regulate through repetition.
- 44.The ember isn't a happy ending. It's proof the nervous system can still generate heat without burning everything down.
- 45.I didn't need a savior. I needed a co-regulator. A steady pulse near mine until mine remembered how to slow down.
- 46.Shame shrinks when named. It metastasizes when hidden.
- 47.The body doesn't forget. It archives. Healing means learning how to read the files without drowning in them.
- 48.I thought sobriety was the finish line. It was just the starting gate.
- 49.You don't heal trauma by erasing it. You heal it by integrating it.
- 50.The worst pain isn't always the event. Sometimes it's the years spent blaming yourself for surviving it.
- 51.I didn't lose my mind. I lost my baseline.
- 52.Connection isn't a cure. It's a calibration tool.
- 53.The storm outside doesn't matter if the storm inside never settles.
- 54.I stopped fighting my nervous system and started listening to it. That's when the fire started cooling.
- 55.Accountability without compassion is just shame in a different suit.
- 56.You don't rebuild trust with promises. You rebuild it with predictable behavior.
- 57.The blueprint isn't destiny. It's a map of where the fault lines are.

58.I didn't need to be fixed before I could be understood. I needed to be understood enough to start fixing what I could.

59.The ember doesn't need to become a wildfire to prove it survived. It just needs space to burn without consuming everything.

60.I'm not healed. I'm aligned. And alignment is enough to keep walking.

That's the anatomy.

Not the whole body.

Not the whole story.

Just sixty bones from the skeleton.

For years, I thought if I could explain myself well enough, somebody would finally understand.

Now I know explanation is not the same as healing.

But naming things matters.

Naming freeze matters.

Naming shame matters.

Naming fawn matters.

Naming dissociation matters.

Naming the rescue boat matters.

Naming the second wound matters.

Because what stays unnamed keeps running the show.

CHAPTER 13

And I'm tired of being controlled by mechanisms I can't see.

This book started as confession.

Then it became excavation.

Now it becomes a map.

The next truth is one of the hardest ones to say out loud:

The things that nearly destroyed me were also the things I reached for because I was trying to stay alive.

That doesn't make them good.

It makes them understandable.

And understanding is where the shame starts losing its teeth.

THE RESCUE BOAT

WHY WE REACH FOR ANYTHING THAT QUIETS THE

ALARM

This ain't about calling addiction a moral failing.

That's the gaslight version.

The lazy version.

The version society loves because it lets everybody stop thinking.

Just say "addict" and the story is over.

Weak.

Selfish.

Criminal.

Dirty.

Hopeless.

Chose drugs over family.

Chose the pipe over the kids.

Chose chaos.

Chose destruction.

Clean little story.

Easy to judge.

Easy to repeat.

Easy to weaponize.

But it ain't the whole truth.

Not even close.

The truth is uglier.

Deeper.

More human.

The truth is that when a nervous system is drowning, it will grab anything that floats.

Even if the thing floating is rotten.

Even if it leaks.

Even if it eventually pulls you under.

That's the rescue boat.

My body learned danger before it learned safety.

Three pounds in a glass box.

NICU alarms.

No mother's touch.

Distance.

Wires.

A priest giving me last rites because they thought I was dying.

Then violence at six.

A thin blanket.

Screams.

Breaking glass.

My heart pounding like it wanted out of my chest.

Freeze became my first language.

Hypervigilance became my native tongue.

The nervous system doesn't forget those lessons.

It doesn't say, "Well, that was childhood." It doesn't say, "That was years ago."

It doesn't say, "You're grown now, calm down."

It keeps score in muscle, breath, gut, sleep, blood pressure, cravings, and reflex.

It stays on high alert.

Smoke detector glued to the ceiling.

Blaring at every shadow because tragedy taught it that quiet moments are usually setups for the next hit.

That constant roar ain't anxiety in the cute way people talk about it.

It's not just worrying too much.

It's a body stuck in alarm.

It's a nervous system carved by repeated, inescapable threat.

The amygdala stays lit.

The body pumps stress like danger is standing in the room.

Sleep fractures.

Emotions hijack you without warning.

The world feels too loud.

Too close.

Too bright.

Too dangerous.

Fluorescent lights buzz like old NICU monitors.

Crowds feel like judgment.

Conflict feels like death.

Closeness feels like risk.

Even love can feel like another blanket about to get ripped off.

When that alarm won't shut off, you reach for anything that dials it down long enough to breathe.

That is the part people miss.

They judge the thing you grabbed.

They don't ask why you were drowning.

Booze at sixteen quieted the shakes.

It made the world feel loose instead of crushing.

It made people less terrifying.

It made my body stop crawling for a while.

Pills at seventeen started with migraines that felt like my skull splitting open.

Hydro.

Darvocet.

Morphine.

Fentanyl patches chewed.

Roxy later.

Straight to the vein.

People hear that and see depravity.

I hear that and remember relief.

That's the dangerous part.

Not the high.

The relief.

When your baseline is panic, normal feels like heaven.

That is how dependency gets hooks into a trauma body.

It doesn't introduce itself as destruction.

It introduces itself as peace.

Meth came later.

Sometimes injected.

Sometimes traded for alcohol depending on which demon showed up first.

And meth is hard to explain because people hear the word and stop listening.

But inside my body, it did something specific.

It broke through freeze.

It forced movement.

It gave energy to a system that had collapsed.

It made me feel capable for a while.

It made the fog lift.

It gave me a way to override the shutdown.

That does not make it safe.

That does not make it okay.

That does not erase the damage.

It explains the hook.

A drowning man does not inspect the boat.

He grabs.

That was me.

Grabbing.

Again and again.

Trying to stay alive with tools that were killing me.

Society loves to blame the boat.

“You’re just an addict.”

“Weak.”

“Selfish.”

“Why can’t you just stop?”

“Don’t you love your kids?”

“Don’t you care what you’re doing?” Those questions sound righteous from the outside.

Inside, they land like knives.

Because I did love my kids.

That’s what made the shame so heavy.

Maverick.

Shayla.

Teaguen.

Adalee.

My heart still beats their names.

I didn't stand there calmly choosing between a meth pipe and them like two items on a menu.

I was trying not to implode under a level of pain, panic, grief, and shame that had no off switch.

I chose the only thing I had found that could slam the volume down in my head for a few hours.

Was it destructive?

Yes.

Did it hurt them?

Yes.

Did it burn trust?

Yes.

Did it cost me pieces of fatherhood I can never get back?

Yes.

I own that.

I will not hide from that.

But I also will not accept the cheap version of the story anymore.

The engine wasn't lack of love.

The engine was dysregulation.

A nervous system stuck in survival mode, grabbing whatever would stop the screaming inside my own skull.

That is not an excuse.

It is the mechanism.

And mechanisms matter because you can't fix what you refuse to understand.

If a man is drowning and you only lecture him about why he shouldn't grab rotten wood, you are not saving him.

You are judging his grip.

You want him to let go?

Give him something safer to hold.

That is recovery.

Not shame.

Not humiliation.

Not "just stop."

Something safer.

A nervous system that can come down without chemicals.

A body that can rest without terror.

A support system that doesn't punish honesty.

A plan for cravings.

Medical care without contempt.

Therapy that understands freeze.

People who know the difference between accountability and disgust.

Predictable behavior.

Repair.

Time.

Repetition.

That is what builds a real boat.

The old rescue boat worked fast.

That's why it was dangerous.

Booze worked fast.

Pills worked fast.

Meth worked fast.

Work worked fast.

Hiding worked fast.

But fast relief is not the same as freedom.

Fast relief often comes with a bill.

And mine came due hard.

My body wore down.

My relationships burned.

My kids got hurt.

My trustworthiness cracked.

My health got worse.

The legal system got involved.

Shame grew teeth.

The thing I reached for to survive became one more storm I had to survive.

That is the tragedy of trauma-based addiction.

The solution becomes another source of danger.

Then people point at the danger and say:

See? You're the problem.

And the shame gets worse.

And the alarm gets louder.

And the need for relief grows.

And the rescue boat looks even more necessary.

That is the loop.

Pain.

Alarm.

Relief.

Damage.

Shame.

More alarm.

More relief.

More damage.

More shame.

Around and around until you either die, get locked up, lose everyone, or finally find language strong enough to interrupt it.

That language saved something in me.

Not all of me.

Not instantly.

But something.

When I learned C-PTSD, addiction stopped looking like proof that I was rotten.

It started looking like a crude regulation strategy.

A dangerous one.

A costly one.

A destructive one.

But a strategy.

That changed the question.

Not “Why am I such a piece of shit?”

But:

What state am I trying to escape?

What alarm am I trying to quiet?

What feeling feels unsurvivable?

What safer tool can I reach for before the old one grabs me?

That is where responsibility can finally live.

Not in shame.

In understanding.

Because shame just says:

You’re bad.

Understanding says: Here is the fire.

Here is the fuel.

Here is the pattern.

Now choose the next interruption.

That is real accountability.

The rescue boat kept me alive until it started drowning me too.

Now the work is building something that floats without poisoning the water.

Something slower.

Harder.

Less dramatic.

A breath.

A call.

A meeting.

A doctor's appointment.

A meal.

A walk.

A boundary.

A night without using.

A craving survived.

A feeling named before it becomes a fire.

A text sent instead of disappearing.

A truth spoken before shame turns it into a secret.

That sounds small to people who have never drowned.

It isn't.

For a trauma body, that is a revolution.

I don't romanticize the boat.

I know what it cost.

I know what it did.

I know who it hurt.

But I also know why I climbed into it.

And until people understand that, they will keep shaming drowning men for grabbing what floats.

They will keep calling survival selfish.

They will keep confusing symptoms for sin.

They will keep asking why addicts don't just stop while refusing to build anything safer than the thing destroying them.

I am done with that story.

The rescue boat was never the destination.

It was the desperate thing I reached for when I thought the water was going to take me.

Now I'm learning to swim.

Not pretty.

Not fast.

Not without going under sometimes.

CHAPTER 14

But learning.

And for the first time, I can look at the boat and tell the truth:

It saved me.

It hurt me.

It hurt people I love.

And I cannot live there anymore.

THE SECOND WOUND

HOW STIGMA TURNS PAIN INTO SHAME

But the rescue boat was only half the story.

The other half was what people called me for reaching for it.

Addict.

Weak.

Selfish.

Crazy.

Immature.

Nobody.

They saw the boat and judged it.

They never looked at the water.

That judgment became its own wound.

The second wound.

And in some ways, that wound almost killed me too.

They always made it sound simple.

“It’s all in your head.”

“You’re making yourself worse.”

“Be a man.”

“Grow up.”

“Most people grow up.”

“Aren’t you tired of being a nobody?”

They said it like they were helping.

Like shame was medicine.

Like humiliation was a ladder.

Like if they could just hit the right nerve, I would finally snap out of it, stand up straight, put the past behind me, and become the version of myself they were comfortable with.

But that is not how Complex PTSD works.

That is not how a nervous system heals.

That is not how a man comes back from a lifetime of being wired for danger.

Those words did not make me stronger.

They made me disappear further inside myself.

They took the parts of me that were already bleeding and told them they were embarrassing.

They took survival responses I barely understood and turned them into character defects.

They took pain that was already heavy and added shame on top of it.

That is the second wound.

The first wound is what happened.

The second wound is what people say about you after it happened.

The first wound is the incubator.

The violence.

The losses.

The marriage.

The drugs.

The funerals.

The closets.

The collapse.

The second wound is being told your reaction to all of that means you are weak, selfish, crazy, lazy, immature, toxic, or broken.

The second wound is stigma.

And stigma does not sit outside the body.

It gets in.

It crawls under the skin.

It changes the way you breathe.

It changes the way you look in the mirror.

It changes the way silence sounds.

It makes every mistake feel like proof.

Every missed call feel like rejection.

Every bad day feel like a verdict.

Every setback feel like the final sentence on your life.

That is what people do not understand about direct stigma.

It is not just an insult.

It becomes evidence.

Evidence that you are weak.

Evidence that you are broken.

Evidence that you are too much.

Evidence that nobody is coming.

Evidence that maybe the world would be better off without you in it.

That is where the danger starts.

Not all at once.

Not loud.

Not dramatic.

It starts quietly.

A thought.

A sentence.

A small internal surrender.

Maybe they are right.

Maybe I am the problem.

Maybe I am making myself worse.

Maybe I am not a man.

Maybe I am a nobody.

Maybe I am already gone.

It's All in Your Head

People say "it's all in your head" like that proves it is not real.

But where do they think terror lives?

Where do they think memory lives?

Where do they think panic starts?

Where do they think the alarm system is?

Of course it is in my head.

It is also in my body.

It is in my stomach when it drops for no reason.

It is in my hands when they shake.

It is in my jaw when it locks.

It is in my chest when it tightens.

It is in my sleep when my body refuses to rest.

It is in the way I hear footsteps.

The way I hear a tone change.

The way I notice a door closing too hard.

The way my body knows danger before my mind has words for it.

So yes, it is in my head.

But that does not mean I invented it.

That does not mean I chose it.

That does not mean I can just decide to stop.

Complex PTSD is not imagination.

It is injury.

It is the body remembering what the mind keeps trying to organize.

It is the nervous system treating today like yesterday because yesterday never got resolved.

It is what happens when danger gets repeated so many times that the brain stops asking, "Am I safe?" and starts assuming, "I am not." When someone says, "It's all in your head," what they are really saying is, "I do not want to understand this."

And when you hear that enough, you stop trying to explain.

You stop reaching.

You stop correcting people.

You stop saying, "No, this is real."

You begin to wonder if maybe you are crazy.

That is how stigma works.

It does not have to prove anything.

It only has to make you doubt yourself.

You're Making Yourself Worse

This one always sounded like responsibility.

"You're making yourself worse."

Like I was standing there with a shovel, digging my own grave on purpose.

Like I enjoyed the panic.

Like I enjoyed depression.

Like I enjoyed destroying good things.

Like I enjoyed being late, frozen, reactive, exhausted, ashamed, and trapped in my own skin.

People love to point at the pattern after it has already become a problem. They do not ask where it came from.

They do not ask what it protected.

They do not ask what it cost to survive before I ever had better tools.

Avoidance made sense when facing things meant being overwhelmed.

Isolation made sense when people were unsafe.

Anger made sense when softness got used against me.

Numbing made sense when feeling everything would have killed me.

Workaholism made sense when stopping meant hearing the screams inside my own head.

Substances made sense when my nervous system was fighting for its life and nothing else reached it fast enough.

That does not mean those things were healthy.

That does not mean they did not hurt people.

That does not mean I get to hide behind trauma and never change.

But it does mean those patterns were not random.

They were not proof that I did not care.

They were not proof that I chose chaos over family.

They were not proof that I wanted to be broken.

They were survival strategies that stayed past their expiration date.

That is the part people miss.

A thing can save you once and destroy you later.

A thing can keep you alive in one season and keep you trapped in the next.

That is why healing is so hard.

You are not just giving up bad habits.

You are letting go of the only things that once kept you alive.

So when someone says, "You're making yourself worse," they may be pointing at something real, but they are saying it in the most damaging way possible.

Because shame does not teach a nervous system safety.

Shame teaches hiding.

Shame teaches lying.

Shame teaches silence.

Shame teaches relapse.

Shame teaches the body that people are still dangerous.

A better sentence would have been:

“I can see this is hurting you now, even if it helped you survive before.”

That sentence leaves a door open.

The other one shuts it.

Be a Man

Nothing has killed more men quietly than that phrase.

Be a man.

Three words.

A whole prison.

It means do not cry.

Do not shake.

Do not admit fear.

Do not say you are lonely.

Do not say you are drowning.

Do not say you miss your kids.

Do not say you are ashamed.

Do not say the memories still own parts of you.

Do not say you need help.

Do not say you are scared of what you might do if the pain does not stop.

Just work.

Provide.

Shut up.

Take it.

Drink it down.

Smoke it down.

Work it off.

Fight it out.

Laugh it off.

Be useful.

Be hard.

Be silent.

And if silence starts killing you, at least die without making anyone uncomfortable.

That is what “be a man” really teaches.

It does not create strength.

It creates emotional starvation.

It teaches boys to become men who cannot name their pain until it comes out sideways.

Rage.

Addiction.

Withdrawal.

Control.

Self-destruction.

A body always braced for war.

A mouth that says “I’m fine” while the soul crawls toward the edge.

I spent so much of my life trying to look okay that I did not know how to tell the truth without feeling weak.

I thought being strong meant needing nothing.

I thought being a man meant carrying everything alone.

I thought if I could just work harder, hurt quieter, and keep moving, maybe nobody would notice how bad it was inside me.

But C-PTSD does not disappear because a man refuses to cry.

It goes underground.

It grows teeth.

It waits.

Then it comes out in the parts of life he wanted most to protect.

His marriage.

His children.

His work.

His body.

His faith.

His ability to sleep.

His ability to feel joy without fear.

“Be a man” did not save me.

It helped bury me.

Real manhood is not silence.

Real manhood is not pretending pain does not exist.

Real manhood is facing the truth without running from it.

It is apologizing.

It is healing.

It is staying alive.

It is letting someone see the wound before the wound becomes a weapon.

A man asking for help is not failing at being a man.

He is refusing to let shame write the ending.

Grow Up

People say “grow up” when they think the problem is maturity.

But trauma does not care how old you are.

You can be grown and still carry a terrified child inside your nervous system.

You can have bills, jobs, kids, responsibilities, and gray in your beard, and still have parts of you frozen in rooms nobody ever rescued you from.

That is not childish.

That is trauma.

There were parts of me that grew up too fast.

Parts that learned to read danger before I learned to feel safe.

Parts that learned to survive adults before I knew how to be a child.

Parts that learned to keep going no matter what.

But there were other parts that never got to grow right.

Parts that never learned trust.

Parts that never learned secure love.

Parts that never learned how to calm down after fear.

Parts that never learned that conflict does not always mean abandonment.

Parts that never learned that rest is safe.

Parts that never learned that I could be loved without performing, pleasing, fixing, or proving.

So when someone says, “Grow up,” they are talking to a wound like it is a bad attitude.

They are yelling at a survival state.

They are shaming the part of a person that actually needs the most care.

That does not mean adults with C-PTSD have no responsibility.

I am responsible for what I do now.

I am responsible for healing.

I am responsible for repair.

I am responsible for learning different responses.

I am responsible for not using my wounds as permission to wound others.

But responsibility without compassion turns into punishment. And punishment is not healing.

A better sentence would have been:

“You are an adult now, and you deserve help healing the parts of you that had to survive too early.”

That sentence tells the truth.

It does not excuse.

It does not shame.

It gives the grown man and the wounded child a way to exist in the same body without hating each other.

Aren't You Tired of Being a Nobody?

That one goes straight for the soul.

“Aren't you tired of being a nobody?”

As if I had not already asked myself that in a thousand different ways.

As if I had not already looked at my life and counted the wreckage.

As if I had not already measured myself against other men and found myself behind.

Behind in money.

Behind in stability.

Behind in family.

Behind in peace.

Behind in reputation.

Behind in everything I thought I was supposed to be by now.

A person with C-PTSD does not need help feeling like a failure.

Most of us already have that covered.

We carry invisible scoreboards in our heads.

Every lost job.

Every relapse.

Every broken relationship.

Every missed chance.

Every person we hurt.

Every person who left.

Every time we said, "This time will be different," and then watched the same fire start again.

So when someone says, "Aren't you tired of being a nobody?" they think they are lighting a fire under you.

They do not realize they are pouring gasoline on shame.

Because the real wound is not laziness.

It is grief.

Grief for the life that might have been.

Grief for the person I could have become if I had not spent so many years surviving.
Grief for the father I wanted to be.

Grief for the husband I failed to be.

Grief for the son, brother, friend, worker, and man I kept trying to become while dragging a war behind me.

Calling someone a nobody does not motivate them.

It confirms the lie trauma already planted.

That their life has no weight.

That their existence is a burden.

That they are only visible when they fail.

No one heals by being convinced they are worthless.

People heal when they can believe there is still something in them worth saving.

Shame: The Wound Under the Wound

Guilt says, "I did something wrong."

Shame says, "I am wrong."

That difference matters.

Guilt can lead to repair.

Shame leads to hiding.

Guilt can say, "I need to make this right."

Shame says, "I ruin everything I touch." Guilt can lead a man to apologize.

Shame can lead him to disappear.

And C-PTSD is full of shame.

Not normal shame.

Not the kind that passes after a mistake.

Deep shame.

Identity shame.

The kind that says your very existence is a problem.

The kind that started before you had words.

The kind that came from being hurt, then blamed.

Neglected, then called needy.

Controlled, then called difficult.

Abused, then told to keep quiet.

Broken, then told you were too sensitive.

That kind of shame does not leave just because time passes.

It becomes the voice inside your head.

Then direct stigma gives that voice a microphone.

“It’s all in your head.”

See? Your pain is fake.

“You’re making yourself worse.”

See? This is your fault.

“Be a man.”

See? You are weak.

“Grow up.”

See? You are pathetic.

“Aren’t you tired of being a nobody?”

See? Your life does not matter.

That is how outside voices become inside voices.

That is how people who harmed you keep speaking through people who never even knew the original wound.

That is why words matter.

Because some words do not just hurt.

They install themselves.

Guilt: The Weight That Turns Against You

Guilt is complicated.

Some guilt is real.

I have hurt people.

I have failed people.

I have made choices that caused damage.

I have reacted from wounds and left wounds in others.

I cannot pretend that did not happen.

Trauma explains some of it.

It does not erase the impact.

That is the hard truth.

But there is another kind of guilt that trauma creates.

False guilt.

The guilt of believing you should have been able to stop what happened to you.

The guilt of believing you should have left sooner.

The guilt of believing you should have fought harder.

The guilt of believing you should have known better as a child.

The guilt of believing you are responsible for everyone's pain.

The guilt of needing help.

The guilt of not being healed fast enough.

The guilt of surviving in ugly ways.

Stigma mixes real guilt and false guilt together until a person cannot tell the difference.

Then guilt stops being a signal for repair.

It becomes a sentence.

It says:

"You have done too much damage."

"You cannot come back from this."

"You do not deserve forgiveness."

"Everyone would be better off without you."

That last sentence is where guilt becomes deadly.

Because suicidal thinking often does not arrive wearing the face of death.

Sometimes it arrives wearing the face of logic.

It tells you it would be merciful to leave.

It tells you your absence would be a gift.

It tells you you have become too heavy for everyone else to carry.

It tells you disappearing would finally make the pain stop.

That is not truth.

That is shame talking in a calm voice.

That is guilt after it has been poisoned.

That is stigma after it has moved inside the bloodstream.

When Stigma Becomes Suicidal Pain

Nobody wants to talk about this part directly.

But we have to.

Direct stigma can push a person closer to suicide.

Not always by itself.

Not like one sentence automatically does it.

But when those sentences stack on top of years of trauma, grief, isolation, addiction, rejection, exhaustion, and self-hatred, they can become part of the weight that breaks a person.

A man with C-PTSD may already be tired in a way sleep cannot fix.

He may already be fighting memories he cannot explain.

He may already be carrying regret that eats him alive.

He may already feel like he lost too much time.

He may already believe his family sees only the worst parts of him.

He may already think his children will never understand.

He may already feel like his name has been ruined.

He may already feel like every attempt to get better ends with him back in the same hole.

Then someone says:

“Be a man.”

“Grow up.”

“You’re making yourself worse.”

“Aren’t you tired of being a nobody?”

And something inside him folds.

Not because he is weak.

Because he was already carrying too much.

People think suicide is always a loud crisis.

Sometimes it is quiet.

Sometimes it is a man sitting alone, staring at nothing, feeling like he has already become a ghost.

Sometimes it is him laughing with people during the day and fighting not to die at night.

Sometimes it is him making jokes because honesty would scare everyone.

Sometimes it is him saying, "I'm tired," and nobody hears what he means.

Sometimes it is him believing that staying alive has become an inconvenience to everyone else.

That is why stigma is dangerous.

It does not just judge pain.

It isolates pain.

And isolated pain starts looking for an exit.

If you are reading this and you know that place, hear me clearly:

You do not have to fix your whole life tonight.

You do not have to solve every regret.

You do not have to become who you were supposed to be before morning.

You only have to stay.

One breath.

One minute.

One phone call.

One door between you and the weapon.

One message to someone who can sit with you.

One call to 988 if you are in the United States.

One moment of not letting shame make the final decision.

The part of you that wants the pain to stop is not your enemy.

But death is not the only way pain stops.

Healing is slower.

Messier.

Harder.

But it leaves you here to see what can still be rebuilt.

The Lie of Tough Love

A lot of people hide cruelty behind “tough love.”

They say, “I’m just being honest.”

But honesty without compassion is often just violence with better manners.

Real tough love has boundaries.

Fake tough love has contempt.

Real tough love says:

“I love you, but I will not enable what is destroying you.”

Fake tough love says:

“You are pathetic.”

Real tough love says:

“What you did hurt me, and it has to change.”

Fake tough love says:

“You are nothing.”

Real tough love says:

“Your trauma matters, but so does your responsibility.”

Fake tough love says:

“Stop using trauma as an excuse.”

Real tough love leaves a path forward.

Fake tough love leaves a person standing in shame with nowhere to go.

That is the difference.

People with C-PTSD do not need lies.

They do not need coddling.

They do not need everyone pretending the damage is not real.

They need truth.

But truth does not have to strip a person of dignity.

Truth does not have to spit on the wound.

Truth does not have to make a man feel like dying is the only honorable thing left.

Accountability Without Dehumanization

This is where people get scared.

They think if we understand trauma, we excuse everything.

No.

Understanding is not excusing.

Explanation is not permission.

Compassion is not a blank check.

A person with C-PTSD can still cause harm.

A person with C-PTSD can still lie, rage, use, avoid, manipulate, abandon, or destroy trust.

Those things have to be faced.

But they have to be faced in a way that does not turn the person into garbage.

There is a way to say:

“You hurt me.”

without saying:

“You are worthless.”

There is a way to say: “You need help.”

without saying:

“You are crazy.”

There is a way to say:

“I cannot live in this chaos.”

without saying:

“You are impossible to love.”

There is a way to say:

“You are responsible for healing.”

without saying:

“Your wound is your fault.”

That difference can save lives.

Because shame does not create accountability.

Shame creates defense.

Shame creates collapse.

Shame creates secrecy.

Shame creates relapse.

Shame creates the belief that repair is impossible.

Accountability says: "You did harm. Now take the next right step."

Stigma says:

"You are harm."

One gives a person a road.

The other gives them a grave.

What People Should Have Said

They could have said:

"I do not fully understand what is happening inside you, but I believe it is real."

They could have said:

"I can see you are stuck in patterns that are hurting you, and I want you to get help."

They could have said:

"You do not have to hide pain to prove you are a man."

They could have said:

"You are grown now, and you are responsible for healing, but I know the wound started before you had control."

They could have said:

"You are not a nobody. You are wounded. You are stuck. You are still here. That means something."

They could have said: "I will not excuse harmful behavior, but I will not shame you for being injured."

They could have said:

"What happened to you matters."

They could have said:

"What you do next matters too."

They could have said:

"Stay."

Sometimes one word matters.

Stay.

Not "get over it."

Not "man up."

Not "stop being dramatic."

Stay.

Stay long enough to feel something different.

Stay long enough to learn what safety feels like.

Stay long enough to repair what can be repaired.

Stay long enough to become someone you have not met yet.

Stay long enough for your children to one day understand more than they understand right now.

Stay long enough for your nervous system to learn that the war is not the whole story.
What Stigma Stole

Stigma stole time.

It stole language.

It stole help.

It stole trust.

It made me think pain was weakness.

It made me think needing people was dangerous.

It made me think my symptoms were proof that I was defective.

It made me hide the truth until the truth came out sideways.

It made me apologize for being wounded before I even understood the wound.

It made me believe I had to earn the right to be treated like a human being.

That is what stigma does.

It does not just misunderstand trauma.

It extends it.

It becomes another unsafe room.

Another accusing voice.

Another reason not to reach out.

Another reason to stay silent.

Another reason to die quietly.

And I am done pretending that is harmless.

The Truth

The truth is, C-PTSD is not weakness.

It is not immaturity.

It is not drama.

It is not a man refusing to grow up.

It is not someone making himself worse because he enjoys suffering.

It is what happens when survival gets wired so deeply that peace feels foreign.

It is what happens when the body learns danger before it learns safety.

It is what happens when shame becomes the language a person speaks to himself.

And healing does not come from more shame.

Healing comes from truth with dignity.

PART V

CHAPTER 15

FORGING THE FLAME

LESSONS LEARNED

THE BODY THAT NEVER GOT THE

ALL-CLEAR

People love saying trauma is in your head.

Like that means it ain't real.

Like if they can't see blood, stitches, bruises, or broken bones, then the damage must be imaginary.

"It's all in your head."

No.

It's in my head, yeah.

But it's also in my chest.

My gut.

My blood pressure.

My blood sugar.

My hormones.

My sleep.

My sex drive.

My energy.

My hands.

My jaw.

My spine.

My breathing.

My skin under fluorescent lights.

My legs when they won't move.

My brain when it goes blank under pressure.

My stomach when dread drops through me before I even know what triggered it.

C-PTSD doesn't just make you sad.

It doesn't just give you bad memories.

It doesn't just make you emotional.

It turns the whole damn body into a fire alarm that never got the all-clear.

And if that alarm keeps screaming long enough, parts start burning out.

I used to think all the physical stuff was just bad luck.

High blood pressure.

Diabetes.

Low testosterone.

Migraines.

Gut issues.

Sleep apnea.

Fatigue.

Brain fog.

Anxiety that felt like electricity in my skin.

A body that felt older than it should.

I thought it was proof I was defective.

Proof I had ruined myself.

Proof I was weak.

Proof I had let myself go.

Proof I wasn't even a man anymore.

But now I see it different.

My body wasn't failing for no reason.

My body had been carrying war-level stress since before I had words.

Three pounds in a glass box.

Thirty days behind walls.

No mother's arms.

No skin-to-skin.

Just wires, alarms, distance, and a priest giving me last rites because they thought I was dying.

Then the blanket at six.

The screaming.

The violence.

The body locking up because moving meant becoming the next target.

Then the deaths.

The addiction.

The marriage.

The shame.

The closets.

The court dates.

The collapse.

The body kept taking hit after hit after hit.

And everybody wanted to know why I couldn't just calm down.

You don't calm down a body that never learned safe.

You teach it.

Slow.

Over and over.

But before you can teach it, you have to stop calling it broken.

The Fire Alarm Body

A normal nervous system is supposed to move.

Danger hits.

The alarm goes off.

The body reacts.

Then the danger passes.

The alarm shuts down.

Breathing slows.

Muscles loosen.

Heart rate drops.

Digestion comes back online.

Sleep becomes possible.

That's how it's supposed to work.

Mine didn't.

My alarm got stuck.

Not because I wanted attention.

Not because I was dramatic.

Not because I was weak.

Because my body learned early that quiet didn't mean safe.

Quiet meant listen harder.

Quiet meant wait.

Quiet meant don't move.

Quiet meant the next hit might be coming.

So my body stayed ready.

Ready for violence.

Ready for rejection.

Ready for abandonment.

Ready for bad news.

Ready for the phone call.

Ready for the door slam.

Ready for the tone change.

Ready for the look.

Ready for the court date.

Ready for the next person to leave.

That's what C-PTSD does.

It teaches the body to live like danger is always close.

The mind might say, "You're okay."

The body says, "Bullshit."

The mind might say, "That was years ago."

The body says, "It can happen again." The mind might say, "Nothing is wrong right now."

The body says, "That's what it felt like right before everything went wrong last time."

That's not paranoia.

That's pattern recognition wired too deep.

That's a fire alarm with no off switch.

High Blood Pressure Is Bracing With Numbers

High blood pressure ain't just numbers on a cuff.

Not for me.

It's decades of bracing.

Decades of muscles tightened for impact.

Decades of adrenaline.

Decades of shallow breathing.

Decades of waiting for the other shoe to drop.

Decades of living like a threat was already in the room.

The body wasn't built to run like that forever.

Stress chemicals are useful when you need to survive a moment.

They help you fight.

Run.

Freeze.

Stay alert.

But when the moment never ends, those same chemicals start wearing the machine down.

The heart works harder.

The blood vessels stay tense.

The body keeps pressure in the system because it thinks pressure means survival.

Then a doctor wraps a cuff around your arm and says your numbers are high.

Like the number is the whole story.

It ain't.

That number has history in it.

It has the glass box in it.

It has the blanket in it.

It has every night I couldn't sleep.

Every panic attack I swallowed.

Every court date that froze me.

Every loss I couldn't grieve right.

Every time I smiled while my body was screaming.

Every time I said "I'm fine" when I wasn't.

High blood pressure was my body saying:

I've been holding the line too long.

Diabetes and the Body Running Wrong

Diabetes felt like another failure.

Another thing to be ashamed of.

Another way my body proved I had let myself go.

But when I look at it through the fire, it makes more sense.

A body stuck in survival mode doesn't run clean.

It burns fuel wrong.

It craves fast relief.

It wants sugar.

It wants caffeine.

It wants nicotine.

It wants alcohol.

It wants pills.

It wants meth.

It wants anything that changes the state for a minute.

When the nervous system is screaming, long-term health doesn't feel real.

The body wants relief now.

That doesn't mean choices don't matter.

They do.

Food matters.

Movement matters.

Medication matters.

Sleep matters.

Sobriety matters.

Showing up to the doctor matters.

I own that.

But shame makes it sound like diabetes is just weakness.

Like it's just laziness.

Like it's just a man who didn't care enough to take care of himself.

That misses the mechanism.

Stress wrecks rhythm.

Trauma wrecks sleep.

Addiction wrecks appetite.

Depression wrecks movement.

Shame wrecks consistency.

Freeze wrecks appointments.

Poverty and chaos wreck routines.

And the body keeps trying to survive with whatever tools are closest. So diabetes wasn't just blood sugar.

It was a body that had lost rhythm.

A body that had spent too many years running hot, crashing hard, eating wrong, sleeping wrong, numbing pain, and trying to make it through one more day.

That doesn't excuse neglecting it.

It explains why caring for it felt impossible for so long.

Low Testosterone and the Shame of Feeling Less Than a

Man

Low testosterone hit different.

Because nobody has to say the shame out loud.

You already hear it.

Less energy.

Less drive.

Less confidence.

Less muscle.

Less sex drive.

More depression.

More fatigue.

More brain fog.

A body that doesn't feel like yours.

A man already carrying shame does not need much help turning that into a verdict.

See?

You're not even a man anymore.

That's the voice.

That's what stigma does.

It takes a lab result and turns it into an identity wound.

But low testosterone is not a moral failure.

It is not proof a man is weak.

It is not proof he is worthless.

It is not proof he is broken beyond repair.

It's a signal.

A warning light.

A body saying:

I have been running too hard for too long.

Stress affects hormones.

Broken sleep affects hormones.

Depression affects hormones.

Substance use affects hormones.

Weight changes affect hormones.

A nervous system stuck in emergency mode affects the whole damn system.

The body can't keep producing strength while it's constantly preparing for war.

That's not weakness.

That's biology under pressure.

And yeah, it matters.

It affects how a man feels when he wakes up.

How he moves.

How he thinks.

How he sees himself.

How he connects.

How he touches or avoids being touched.

How he handles rejection.

How heavy the day feels before it even starts.

Low testosterone added another layer to the shame pile.

But shame didn't fix it.

Shame never fixes anything.

It just makes a man hide from the doctor, hide from his partner, hide from himself, and pretend he doesn't care.

Healing means looking at the number without letting it name you.

It means saying:

This is part of the damage.

Not the definition of me.

Sleep: The Body That Won't Stand Down

Sleep is supposed to be where the body repairs.

Mine treated sleep like surrender.

And surrender didn't feel safe.

How do you rest when your nervous system learned helplessness before safety?

How do you sleep when your body thinks being still means danger can get you?

How do you shut your eyes when your body has spent a lifetime scanning?

Sleep paralysis.

Night screams.

Waking up exhausted.

Sleep apnea.

Broken sleep.

A body that never fully powers down.

That's what C-PTSD did to me.

Even when I was unconscious, my body was still fighting.

The boy under the blanket stayed awake inside the man.

The baby in the glass box still heard alarms.

The grown man laid down, but the nervous system kept watch.

And when sleep breaks, everything else breaks with it.

Blood pressure.

Blood sugar.

Hormones.

Mood.

Memory.

Focus.

Appetite.

Sex drive.

Patience.

Pain tolerance.

A man can look lazy from the outside when really he hasn't had true rest in years.

He can look unmotivated when his body is running on fumes.

He can look careless when his brain is fogged from sleep that never repaired anything.

People say, "Just get up."

Like the body got restored overnight.

Some nights don't restore you.

Some nights just keep you alive until morning.

The Gut That Carried the Fear

My gut always knew before I did.

That drop.

That twist.

That burn.

That sick feeling when stress hit.

The stomach is where fear went when I didn't have anywhere else to put it.

People talk about anxiety like it's thoughts.

Mine was physical.

A knot.

A churn.

A pressure.

A sour heat.

A body preparing for something it couldn't name.

When the nervous system is in survival mode, digestion gets shoved to the side.

The body ain't worried about digesting food when it thinks danger is coming.

It wants blood to the muscles.

It wants alertness.

It wants escape.

It wants survival.

So the gut pays.

Ulcers.

Nausea.

Bathroom problems.

No appetite.

Too much appetite.

Stress eating.

Stress starving.

A stomach that doesn't know peace because the rest of the system doesn't either.

My gut wasn't weak.

It was carrying fear I didn't know how to speak.

Migraines, Pain, and the Body Begging for Quiet

Pain was another language.

Migraines especially.

The kind that made light feel violent.

The kind that made sound hurt.

The kind that made me want a dark room, a cold floor, and anything that would make it stop.

That's where pills first looked like mercy.

Not rebellion.

Not fun.

Mercy.

A migraine hit, a pill quieted it, and suddenly the world became bearable.

That was the trap.

Because when your baseline is panic, anything that makes you feel normal feels holy.

The body learns fast.

This stops pain.

This turns down the volume.

This lets me function.

Then the rescue boat becomes a cage.

But the original need was real.

The pain was real.

The overload was real.

The need for quiet was real.

C-PTSD turns the volume up on everything.

Light.

Sound.

Touch.

Emotion.

Memory.

Threat.

Pain.

And when the world is that loud, relief becomes dangerous because relief feels like survival.

Brain Fog and Executive Shutdown

C-PTSD makes thinking harder.

That sounds too simple, but it's true.

Planning gets harder.

Remembering gets harder.

Following through gets harder.

Paperwork gets harder.

Appointments get harder.

Court gets harder.

Phone calls get harder.

The next step disappears.

Not because I didn't care.

Because the brain doesn't organize life well when the survival system is driving.

Executive function goes offline under threat.

The body says danger.

The brain says fog.

That's how you can know something matters and still not do it.

That's how you can hate yourself for missing something and still freeze the next time.

That's how court dates turn into warrants.

Appointments turn into shame.

Bills turn into panic.

Phone calls turn into avoidance.

People see the failure.

They don't see the shutdown before it.

They don't see the nervous system flooding.

They don't see the brain underwater.

They don't see the man sitting there, furious at himself, unable to make his body obey.

That is one of the cruelest parts of C-PTSD.

It makes you look careless while you are drowning in effort nobody can see.

The Body Reaching for Relief

This is where addiction makes sense.

Not acceptable.

Not harmless.

Not excused.

But understandable.

A body stuck in C-PTSD reaches for relief because relief feels like life.

Booze quieted the shakes.

Pills muted the pain.

Meth broke through the freeze.

Work drowned out the grief.

Food shifted the state.

Nicotine gave the hands something to do.

Caffeine pushed the dead body forward.

Anything that changed the channel became useful.

That's the rescue boat.

But rescue boats can rot.

They can leak.

They can turn into traps.

They can keep you alive in one season and destroy you in the next.

That's what happened.

The things that helped me survive started costing me everything.

But if you only call it addiction, you miss the whole story.

The deeper story is dysregulation.

A body that didn't know how to come down.

A nervous system that didn't know safe.

A man using whatever he could find to stop the alarm for a few hours.

Again, I own the damage.

I own the hurt.

I own the consequences.

But I will not call survival a moral failure anymore.

The Warning Lights

High blood pressure was a warning light.

Diabetes was a warning light.

Low testosterone was a warning light.

Sleep apnea was a warning light.

Migraines were a warning light.

Gut problems were a warning light.

Brain fog was a warning light.

Panic was a warning light.

Freeze was a warning light.

Addiction was a warning light.

The body was not betraying me.

It was telling the truth in the only language it had left.

For years, I hated my body.

I hated the shaking.

The sweating.

The weakness.

The fatigue.

The cravings.

The shutdown.

The way I couldn't just be normal.

The way other people seemed to move through life without fighting themselves every damn step.

But this body carried me.

Through the glass box.

Through the blanket.

Through the funerals.

Through addiction.

Through shame.

Through collapse.

Through nights I didn't think I'd survive.

Even when I hated it, it kept trying.

Even when it froze, it was trying to protect me.

Even when it panicked, it was trying to warn me.

Even when it shut down, it was trying to keep me from overload.

Even when it reached for chemicals, it was trying to regulate.

Not always in healthy ways.

Not always in ways that helped.

But always for a reason.

That matters.

Because once I understand the reason, I can stop calling myself broken long enough to start rebuilding.

Healing Has to Include the Body

I cannot think my way out of this.

I tried.

I cannot shame my way out of it.

I tried that too.

I cannot just decide to be normal.

The body doesn't work like that.

The nervous system regulates through repetition, not speeches.

It needs proof.

Over and over.

Proof that rest is safe.

Proof that food can be fuel instead of punishment or escape.

Proof that movement does not have to be performance.

Proof that sleep is not surrender to danger.

Proof that medical care is not weakness.

Proof that medication is not failure.

Proof that asking for help does not make me less of a man.

Proof that a feeling can rise and fall without destroying me.

Proof that a craving can pass.

Proof that a boundary can hold.

Proof that a court date can be faced.

Proof that a doctor's appointment can be kept.

Proof that a body can come down without chemicals.

Proof that I can stay.

Healing C-PTSD means healing the body too.

The blood pressure.

The blood sugar.

The hormones.

The sleep.

The gut.

The muscles.

The breath.

The nervous system.

The whole machine.

Not because I'm trying to become perfect.

Because I'm tired of living like every day is an emergency.

The All-Clear

That's what my body never got.

The all-clear.

Nobody told the baby in the glass box, "You're safe now."

Nobody told the six-year-old under the blanket, "It's over."

Nobody told the teenager shaking in crowded halls, "Your body makes sense."

Nobody told the addict, "You're not weak. You're dysregulated and desperate for relief." Nobody told the grown man with high blood pressure, diabetes, low testosterone, sleep apnea, fatigue, shame, and a nervous system on fire, “This is not proof you failed. This is proof you carried too much for too long.”

So I’m telling him now.

This body was not built wrong.

It was built under pressure.

It adapted to survive hell.

It learned danger because danger kept showing up.

It reached for relief because pain had no off switch.

It broke rhythm because it never got rest.

It ran hot because nobody taught it how to cool down.

And now the work is not to hate it.

The work is to teach it.

Slowly.

Patiently.

Truthfully.

The danger was real.

The damage was real.

The health problems are real.

The responsibility is real.

But shame is not the cure.

The body kept the receipts.

The body kept me alive.

Now I have to give it something it never got enough of:

care without contempt.

structure without punishment.

accountability without shame.

rest without guilt.

help without humiliation.

A body can learn war.

Mine did.

But a body can also learn peace.

Not all at once.

Not overnight.

CHAPTER 16

Not because someone tells it to calm down.

One signal at a time.

One breath.

One appointment.

One meal.

One walk.

One night of sleep.

One craving survived.

One blood pressure reading faced.

One blood sugar number owned.

One lab result handled without letting it name me.

One day where the alarm rings and I do not obey it.

That is where the rewiring starts.

Not in pretending the body is fine.

In finally listening to what it has been trying to say.

I am tired.

I am overloaded.

I am carrying too much.

I need help.

And for once, instead of calling that weakness, I'm calling it truth.

FINDING THE MAP IN THE MADNESS

The legal timeline is stark.

Cold facts.

Dates.

Charges.

Failures.

The kind of record that looks simple from the outside because paper has no nervous system.

Paper doesn't sweat.

Paper doesn't freeze.

Paper doesn't dissociate.

Paper doesn't lose time.

Paper doesn't feel its chest tighten when a court date gets close.

Paper just records what happened.

Driving on a suspended license.

Failure to Appear.

Failure to Comply.

Warrants.

Brief attempts at compliance followed by collapse.

On paper, it paints a picture of someone who just couldn't follow rules.

Someone irresponsible.

Someone defiant.

Someone who didn't care enough to show up.

For a long time, that's how I saw it too.

Another layer of failure.

Another file proving what shame had been saying for years:

You're the problem.

But C-PTSD doesn't care how things look.

It cares how they land.

And court landed like threat.

Authority landed like threat.

Deadlines landed like threat.

Paperwork landed like threat.

Probation landed like threat.

Phone calls landed like threat.

Anything that felt like judgment, punishment, or public failure lit up the same alarm.

The pattern wasn't rebellion.

It was hijack.

A nervous system hijacking my intentions the second stress got too high.

That doesn't make the consequences fake.

The warrants were real.

The missed dates were real.

The failures were real.

The damage to trust was real.

But the mechanism was not simple defiance.

It was a body built for survival crashing into a system built for compliance.

Those two systems speak different languages.

The legal system asks:

Did you show up?

Did you pay?

Did you complete it?

Did you follow instructions?

Did you comply?

Trauma asks:

Am I safe?

Can I move?

Can I breathe?

Can I think?

Can I survive this moment?

Those are not the same questions.

And when the body is stuck in survival, compliance becomes harder than people understand.

Executive Dysfunction Under Stress

People think following through is just a character issue.

You either care or you don't.

You either do it or you don't.

You either show up or you don't.

That sounds clean.

It ain't.

Following through takes executive function.

Planning.

Remembering.

Organizing.

Prioritizing.

Sequencing.

Managing time.

Making calls.

Reading instructions.

Keeping track of dates.

Staying calm enough to act.

That part of the brain does not work right when the survival system takes over.

Stress hits.

The alarm goes off.

The thinking brain goes dim.

Suddenly, simple things become impossible.

A court date is not just a date.

It becomes a threat marker.

A probation requirement is not just a task.

It becomes pressure.

A phone call is not just a phone call.

It becomes exposure.

The more important something is, the more threat attaches to it.

That is the cruel part.

The things I most needed to handle became the things most likely to shut me down.

I could know something mattered and still not be able to organize myself around it.

I could know missing court would make things worse and still freeze. I could know I needed to call and still stare at the phone like it weighed a hundred pounds.

That does not look good from the outside.

I know that.

It looks like not caring.

But inside, it felt like my brain went underwater.

The instructions blurred.

The dates floated away.

The next step disappeared.

Then shame came in and made everything heavier.

Avoidance and Freeze

Freeze is not the same as refusal.

That needs to be said again and again until systems start hearing it.

Refusal has a choice in it.

Freeze has terror.

Refusal says, "I won't."

Freeze says, "I can't move."

From the outside, they can look the same.

That's the problem.

Courtrooms and authority figures became massive triggers for me. Not because I thought I was above the law.

Not because I didn't understand consequences.

Because the whole situation felt like being trapped.

Eyes on me.

Rules I didn't fully understand.

Language that sounded official and cold.

A judge above me.

A room where one wrong move could make everything worse.

That setup hit the same old wiring.

Blanket.

Glass box.

Closets.

Danger.

Be still.

Don't draw attention.

Survive.

So when stress got too high, my body did what it had always done.

Freeze.

Legs locked.

Mind blank.

Chest tight.

Time gone weird.

A whole grown man unable to do the next obvious thing.

People say, "Just go."

They don't understand that sometimes "just go" feels like walking into incoming fire.

They say, "Just call."

They don't understand that sometimes a phone call feels like stepping in front of a firing squad.

They say, "Just handle your business."

They don't understand that trauma can turn business into threat.

That is not an excuse.

It is the map.

Dissociation and Memory Gaps

Stress also messed with my memory.

Not in a convenient way.

Not in a fake way.

In the way a brain protects itself by not fully recording what overwhelms it.

Judges.

Probation officers.

Court staff.

Instructions.

Dates.

Conditions.

Do this.

Don't do that.

Come here.

Pay this.

Call them.

Sign that.

A regulated brain can take that in.

Write it down.

Plan around it.

Follow through.

A flooded brain does not work like that.

A flooded brain hears words through water.

It catches pieces.

Misses others.

Nods because it knows nodding is expected.

Then later, the details are gone.

Not because I didn't care.

Because I wasn't fully there.

That is dissociation.

The body stays in the room.

The mind pulls back.

Enough to survive.

Not enough to function well.

Then later, people say, "You were told."

And they are right.

I was told.

But being told and being able to encode it are not the same thing.

That difference matters.

Especially inside systems that punish failure without asking what kind of brain state the person was in when instructions were given.

Shame Reinforcement

Every missed date made the next one harder.

That's the loop.

I'd fail.

Then shame would speak.

See?

You can't handle it.

You're broken.

You're irresponsible.

You're exactly what they think you are.

That shame didn't motivate me.

It tightened the trap.

Because now the next court date wasn't just a court date.

It was every previous failure standing behind it.

Every warrant.

Every disappointed look.

Every lecture.

Every accusation.

Every ugly thing I believed about myself.

The pressure got heavier.

The freeze came faster.

The consequences got worse.

Then shame got louder.

That's how systems can accidentally create the very behavior they punish.

Not because consequences are fake.

But because shame and threat do not improve executive function.

They crush it.

If a person already freezes under pressure, adding humiliation does not create responsibility.

It creates more pressure.

More freeze.

More avoidance.

More failure.

More shame.

A vicious loop dressed up as accountability.

Substance Use as Override

Sometimes meth broke through the freeze.

That's another ugly truth.

It gave movement when my body had shut down.

It forced energy into a dead system.

It made the fog lift for a while.

It made impossible things feel doable.

That does not make it good.

It does not make it safe.

It does not erase what it cost.

But it explains part of the hook.

Other times, substances were escape from the anxiety before shutdown hit.

A way to not feel the court date.

Not feel the shame.

Not feel the dread.

Not feel the whole room closing in.

Either way, it fed the legal spiral.

Use made functioning worse in the long run.

Shame made use more tempting.

Legal pressure made shame louder.

The whole thing fed itself.

Pain.

Pressure.

Freeze.

Use.

Consequences.

Shame.

More pressure.

More freeze.

More use.

That is not a simple moral failure.

That is a machine.

And machines keep running until someone interrupts the mechanism.

The Docket and the Nervous System

The FTAs and FTCs were not just failures of will.

They were often the result of a brain and body desperately trying, and failing, to cope with unbearable internal states triggered by external pressure.

The choices were mine.

The consequences are mine.

I own that.

But owning something does not mean lying about how it worked.

The mechanism matters.

Because if you call every trauma response defiance, you build the wrong solution.

You threaten harder.

You shame louder.

You punish more.

And sometimes that just drives the person deeper into the exact shutdown you're trying to stop.

A trauma-informed system would still hold people accountable.

It would still require follow-through.

It would still protect the community.

But it would understand that some people need scaffolding, not just consequences.

Written instructions.

Reminders.

Case management.

Clear steps.

Human language.

Less humiliation.

A way to re-enter compliance after freeze without the whole system becoming another trauma chamber.

That is not coddling.

That is strategy.

Because the goal should be function.

Not just punishment.

The Other Map: The Names

Then there's the other map.

The names.

Twenty-three dead.

Not a statistic.

Not a dramatic phrase.

A timeline carved into bone.

Sylvie Dean Kraus.

Nicholas D. Williams.

Thomas Paul Williams.

Herbert William Lingar.

Judy Ann Lingar.

Argie Faye Williams.

Ashley Nicole Williams.

Warren Wade Ellett.

Chad Argus Acord.

William Garrett Lingar.

Daniel Lee Stewart.

Jerry Don Williams.

Justin Dean Phillips.

Todd Anthony Lingar.

Marie Elizabeth Lingar.

Gabriel Allen Woods.

Jason Jones.

Paula Faye Pitts.

John Wesley Robinson.

Patricia Lynn Lingar.

Deanna Lynn Teague.

Clint Lee Larrison.

Joseph David Middleton.

Billy Aaron Dean Woods.

Twenty-three names.

Twenty-three ruptures.

Twenty-three reminders that loss was not an idea in my life.

It was a pattern.

Grief doesn't stack neatly.

It overlaps.

It echoes.

It waits.

Each loss trained my predictive model.

Tragedy is the baseline.

That's not paranoia.

That's pattern recognition.

You don't lose that many people and expect calm.

You learn to brace.

You learn not to trust good news.

You learn the phone ringing can change your life.

You learn silence can mean death.

You learn funerals are not rare interruptions.

They are chapters.

A body that has lived through that much loss does not walk into the world neutral.

It walks in carrying the next disaster before it happens.

That is why calm felt suspicious.

That is why joy felt temporary.

That is why attachment felt dangerous.

That is why my body stayed ready.

Because too many times, ready felt like the only sane response.

The Two Maps Together

The legal docket and the loss list are mirrors.

One shows the external fallout of an overloaded system.

The other shows the emotional toll of sustained exposure to rupture.

One says:

Here is where the world recorded your failures.

The other says:

Here is what your body was carrying while you failed.

Together, they form a map of the terrain I've been walking through.

Not to excuse it.

Not to wallow in it.

To name it.

Because you can't navigate what you refuse to name.

If I only look at the docket, I see a criminal pattern.

If I only look at the grief, I see a wounded man.

Both are incomplete.

The truth is in the collision.

A wounded man made harmful choices inside systems that did not understand the wound.

A nervous system shaped by loss crashed into legal demands that required regulation, memory, organization, and follow-through.

A man drowning in shame kept getting handed more shame and told to swim better.
That was the madness.

CHAPTER 17

The map does not erase the madness.

It shows the roads that led there.

And once you can see the roads, maybe you can stop walking the same ones blind.

That is the point now.

Not innocence.

Direction.

Not self-pity.

Pattern recognition.

Not blame.

A map.

Because a map doesn't save you by itself.

But it can show you where you are.

And after years of wandering through fire, knowing where you are is not small.

It is the first honest ground.

THE COMPLEX DANCE OF CONNECTION

Connection isn't a switch.

It's calibration.

And when your nervous system was wired in a glass box, calibrated by violence, reinforced by abandonment, and trained by shame, calibration does not come naturally.

It has to be learned.

Painfully.

Slowly.

With repetition.

With failure.

With repair.

For years, I treated relationships like threat assessments.

That is the truth.

Not romance.

Not partnership.

Not safety.

Threat assessment.

Who is mad?

Who is leaving?

Who is lying?

Who is about to turn cold?

What did that tone mean?

Why did that message change?

Why are they quiet?

What did I do wrong?

What am I about to lose?

That is not love.

That is surveillance.

But when your body learned early that people can become dangerous without warning, surveillance feels like wisdom.

I did not know how to simply be close.

Proximity felt like risk.

Intimacy felt like exposure.

Love felt like a room where the exits might disappear.

So I defaulted to survival mechanics.

Fawn.

Flee.

Freeze.

Fight.

Shrink to avoid conflict.

Push away before I could be left.

Cling when the abandonment panic hit.

Tolerate mistreatment because chaos felt familiar.

Perform until I was exhausted.

Hide when the truth got too heavy.

Call it loyalty when it was really fear.

Call it love when it was really proximity management.

That phrase matters.

Proximity management.

Because that is what I was doing.

Managing distance.

Managing threat.

Managing tone.

Managing somebody else's mood.

Managing my own panic.

Managing the space between being abandoned and being swallowed.

Too close felt dangerous.

Too far felt lethal.

So I lived in between, constantly adjusting, constantly scanning, constantly trying to keep the whole thing from blowing up.

That is exhausting.

And it is not connection.

It is survival with another person in the room.

Love Through a Trauma Body

A trauma body does not experience love clean.

It filters it.

Through memory.

Through fear.

Through old data.

Through every person who left.

Every person who lied.

Every person who used tenderness as bait.

Every person who made closeness unsafe.

So when love shows up, the body does not just say, "This is good."

It asks questions.

What will this cost?

When will it change?

How long before they see the real me?

How long before they leave?

How much of myself do I have to erase to keep this?

How much pain do I have to tolerate to avoid being alone?

That is how a person can crave connection and fear it at the same time.

That was me.

I wanted to be loved.

Desperately.

But I did not trust love once it got close.

I wanted someone to stay.

But staying made me feel exposed.

I wanted peace.

But peace felt like the quiet before the next hit.

I wanted a home.

But home had never been simple.

So I built relationships on alarms.

Not because I wanted chaos.

Because chaos was the language my nervous system understood.

Calm felt foreign.

Kindness felt suspicious.

Intensity felt familiar.

That is why love bombing works on trauma survivors.

It feels like rescue.

The attention hits the abandonment wound like medicine.

The intensity feels like proof.

The mirroring feels like being seen for the first time.

But real love does not need to flood you to reach you.

Real love does not rush your nervous system into dependency.

Real love does not make you feel chosen and then use that hunger to control you.

Love bombing is not love.

It is a nervous system hack.

And if you already believe you are hard to love, you will mistake the flood for a miracle.

I did.

More than once.

Fawning Is Not Love

Fawning became second nature to me.

I did not know that word for most of my life.

I just thought I was being patient.

Loyal.

Understanding.

Forgiving.

Easygoing.

The kind of man who could take it.

But underneath, I was threat managing.

Keep the peace.

Don't make it worse.

Don't upset them.

Don't ask for too much.

Don't need too loudly.

Don't say the thing that might make them leave.

Don't create conflict.

Don't become a problem.

That is not love.

That is fear wearing kindness.

Fawning can look noble from the outside.

The person who gives in.

The person who apologizes first.

The person who absorbs the mood of the room.

The person who stays quiet.

The person who keeps showing up.

The person who forgives again and again.

But inside, fawning is disappearance.

It is self-erasure as a survival strategy.

It says:

If I become small enough, maybe I will be safe.

If I agree fast enough, maybe this won't explode.

If I stay useful enough, maybe they won't leave.

If I hide my needs enough, maybe I can keep this relationship alive.

That is how a grown man ends up hiding in closets in his own house.

Not because he is stupid.

Not because he has no pride.

Because his nervous system believes visibility equals danger.

Because peace has always required disappearance.

Because old survival rules do not care how humiliating they become.

They only care that you survive the moment.

But surviving the moment can cost you your self-respect over time.

That was the bill.

Boundaries Are Not Walls

Repair starts with boundaries.

Not walls.

Boundaries.

I had walls.

Plenty of them.

Isolation.

Silence.

Avoidance.

Numbing.

Disappearing.

Those were walls.

Walls keep everything out.

They protect you, but they also trap you.

Boundaries are different.

Boundaries define where I end and someone else begins.

They say:

This is what I can hold.

This is what I can't.

This is what I will discuss.

This is what I won't be called.

This is where I stay.

This is where I step back.

This is what love can ask of me.

This is what love does not get to demand.

For someone who spent decades erasing himself to survive, drawing a line feels like treason.

It feels selfish.

Mean.

Dangerous.

Like you are starting the fight instead of stopping the harm.

But a boundary is not an attack.

It is a location.

It tells the truth about where you are.

And if a relationship cannot survive you having a location, it was not connection.

It was control.

That is a hard truth.

Because when you are trauma-wired, control can feel safer than freedom.

At least control is predictable.

At least you know the rules.

At least if you obey, maybe the room stays calm.

Freedom means choice.

Choice means risk.

Risk means someone might leave.

So boundaries feel like standing on a cliff.

But without them, you do not become loving.

You become absorbent.

You soak up everything until you rot.

Co-Regulation

Real connection requires something trauma-wired systems are not trained for.

Co-regulation.

Two nervous systems sharing space.

Matching pace.

Signaling safety.

Building predictability.

I did not know what that looked like.

I knew control.

I knew performance.

I knew hiding.

I knew love bombing.

I knew gaslighting.

I knew walking on eggshells.

I knew how to read a room for danger.

I did not know how to read a room for safety.

But I had moments.

Small ones.

Beth's mother holding me after Garrett died without trying to fix it.

No lecture.

No shame.

No "calm down."

Just arms.

Just presence.

That was co-regulation before I had the word.

A steady body beside a shattered one.

That moment mattered because it showed me something my nervous system did not believe:

Pain can be witnessed without being punished.

That is what safe connection does.

It does not erase pain.

It helps the body carry it without drowning.

A safe person does not become your savior.

They become a signal.

Their steadiness tells your nervous system:

You are not alone in this moment.

The danger is not the whole room.

Breathe.

Slow down.

Stay.

That is different from rescue.

I spent years looking for rescue.

A person to fix me.

A person to make the alarm stop.

A person to prove I mattered so loudly that shame would shut up.

That does not work.

No person can become your nervous system for you.

That is too much weight to put on anybody.

I did not need a savior.

I needed co-regulation.

And then I needed to learn self-regulation so I would stop making other people responsible for the fire inside me.

That is the work.

Trust Is Built With Predictable Behavior

Trust is not rebuilt with promises.

I wish it was.

I made plenty of promises.

To myself.

To others.

To my kids.

To people I loved.

This time will be different.

I'll stop.

I'll show up.

I'll do better.

I'll fix it.

I meant those promises when I made them.

That is the painful part.

I was not always lying when I said them.

Sometimes I was telling the truth from a state I could not sustain. A regulated moment made a promise that a dysregulated body later could not keep.

That does not erase the harm.

It explains why promises were not enough.

Trust is rebuilt with predictable behavior.

Consistency.

Follow-through.

Showing up when I say I will.

Naming when I can't.

Repairing when I misstep.

Not disappearing because I'm ashamed.

Not making my shame somebody else's job to soothe.

Not demanding instant forgiveness because I finally understand myself.

Not using trauma as a shield against accountability.

Predictable behavior is the only currency that matters to a nervous system that has been burned too many times.

Especially with my kids.

Maverick.

Shayla.

Teaguen.

Adalee.

They do not need speeches from me as much as they need evidence.

Evidence that I am changing.

Evidence that I can tell the truth.

Evidence that I can own harm without collapsing into self-hatred.

Evidence that I can keep showing up in whatever way they allow.

Evidence that I can love them without asking them to carry me.

That is hard.

Because shame wants to rush the process.

Shame wants a verdict.

Forgive me or reject me.

Love me or hate me.

Tell me I am okay or confirm I am nothing.

But healing relationships does not work on shame's timeline.

Trust takes time because damage took time.

That is fair.

Painful.

But fair.

The Kids Are Anchors, Not Saviors My kids are not saviors.

That sentence matters.

Because love for your children can keep you alive, but it cannot do the healing for you.

Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, and Adalee are anchors.

And anchors do not pull you out of the water.

They keep you from drifting while you swim.

My love for them is not a cure for C-PTSD.

It is a reason to keep doing the work.

A reason to learn the mechanics of healthy proximity.

A reason to stop treating connection like a trap.

A reason to become someone who can love without drowning the people he loves.

They deserved a father who was regulated.

Present.

Safe.

Consistent.

Not perfect.

Safe.

They deserved a father who knew how to carry pain without turning it into chaos.

They deserved a father who could say, "I'm struggling," before struggling became a fire. They deserved a father who did not need substances to survive the night.

They deserved a father who did not disappear into shame.

They deserved better than what they got from me during the worst years.

That is not self-hatred.

That is truth.

And truth is the only ground repair can stand on.

I cannot go back and become the father they needed then.

That sentence hurts.

But I can become a different man now.

Not to demand anything from them.

Not to force forgiveness.

Not to rewrite their memories.

But because love without change is just another promise.

And they have heard enough promises.

Apology Without Collapse

One of the hardest skills I have had to learn is how to apologize without collapsing.

That sounds strange until you understand shame.

Healthy guilt says:

I hurt you.

I need to own that.

I need to repair what I can.

Shame says:

I am horrible.

I ruin everything.

You should hate me.

I might as well disappear.

When shame takes over, the apology can become another burden for the person you hurt.

Instead of making space for their pain, you make them manage yours.

I have done that.

I do not want to anymore.

A real apology does not demand comfort.

It does not say, "Please tell me I'm not bad."

It does not rush the other person into forgiveness.

It does not explain so much that the explanation becomes escape.

A real apology says:

I see the harm.

I own my part.

You did not deserve that.

I am working to change the pattern.

You get to feel how you feel.

That is terrifying when your nervous system equates rejection with death.

But it is necessary.

Because accountability without collapse is how trust starts becoming possible.

Not guaranteed.

Possible.

Walking Away Without Erasing Myself

Another skill is walking away without erasing myself.

For years, leaving felt like death.

Conflict felt lethal.

Abandonment panic could hijack my whole system.

So I stayed in places I should have left.

I tolerated things I should have named.

I went quiet when I should have stood up.

I became invisible because invisibility felt safer than loss.

But connection cannot be built by self-erasure.

If I have to disappear to keep someone, I have not kept love.

I have kept captivity.

Walking away does not always mean abandoning someone.

Sometimes it means refusing to abandon yourself.

Sometimes it means stepping back before fight, fawn, freeze, or collapse takes over.

Sometimes it means saying:

I cannot have this conversation while I'm flooded.

I need space.

I will come back when I can speak clean.

Sometimes it means leaving a relationship that only survives when I am small.

That is not cruelty.

That is recovery.

Connection as Practice

You do not heal relational trauma by finding the perfect person.

That fantasy will keep you sick.

Because then every relationship becomes a test:

Can you finally make me feel safe?

Can you finally prove I am lovable?

Can you finally stay in a way that erases everyone who left?

No human being can carry that job.

You heal relational trauma by becoming a person who can practice connection differently. A person who can tolerate proximity without panicking.

A person who can set boundaries without punishing.

A person who can apologize without collapsing.

A person who can walk away without erasing himself.

A person who can name fear before it becomes accusation.

A person who can hear silence without instantly turning it into abandonment.

A person who can let love be steady instead of addictive.

It is slow.

Messy.

Embarrassing sometimes.

It requires sitting with discomfort instead of numbing it.

It requires catching the old reflex before it takes over.

It requires saying:

This feels like danger, but maybe it is just vulnerability.

This feels like abandonment, but maybe it is just space.

This feels like rejection, but maybe it is just a hard conversation.

This feels like death, but maybe it is just shame.

That is calibration.

The complex dance of connection is not about never stepping wrong. It is about noticing faster.

Repairing sooner.

Returning cleaner.

Staying present without swallowing yourself.

And learning, little by little, that people are not only threats.

Some are.

Some were.

Some will be.

But not all.

And the only way my nervous system learns that is through new data.

Predictable behavior.

Safe boundaries.

Honest repair.

Steady connection.

Not perfect.

Steady.

That is what I am learning now.

Connection is not a trap.

It is not a rescue boat.

It is not a courtroom.

CHAPTER 18

It is not a closet.

It is not a glass box.

It is a practice.

And for a man who spent most of his life managing distance, practicing connection may be the hardest work of all.

But it is also the only path that does not lead back to the same wreckage.

CONVERSATIONS AT MIDNIGHT

The silence of the late hours hits different when you've spent the day performing normal.

One of those nights where the walls feel closer, the quiet gets loud, and you reach for something—anything—to untangle the wires in your head. What starts as a quiet exchange with yourself turns into a reckoning. No audience. No script. Just the truth, stripped bare.

It started with trying to connect. I poured months into a video. Creativity, energy, everything I had left. Showed it to the people I cared about most. Silence. Teaguen said he had no time.

Shayla brushed it off like it didn't matter.

Then the songs. Written for her. Better than the noise on the radio. Meant to say what I couldn't out loud. Unheard. Unacknowledged.

That hurt. Not because of the work. Because of what it meant. A need to be seen. To be understood. To matter.

My brain twisted the indifference into proof. You don't matter. You're too much. You're broken.

That old tape, playing on loop. I started believing it. Again.

But as I spoke—actually spoke, out loud to the empty room—something shifted.

Vulnerability isn't weakness. It's exposure. And exposure is how you stop lying to yourself.

My tears weren't failure. My need for connection wasn't pathetic. They were just proof the nervous system hadn't flatlined yet.

I talked about the loops. The way my mind traps me in fear, tells me not to reach out, not to risk dragging someone else into the smoke. It's the blueprint again: Shut down before they leave.

Protect yourself by disappearing first.

There's a woman I wanted to talk to. She seemed interested. My brain screamed: Abort. You'll ruin it. You'll hurt her. Walk away.

CHAPTER 19

So I did. I broke my own heart trying to save hers.

It's hard to admit that. Hard to sit with the shame of a 42-year-old man fighting invisible battles, crying too often, asking for space to breathe and getting indifference. Three people last year told me I didn't matter. For a while, I believed them.

But tonight's silence reminded me: emotions aren't flaws. They're data. They're proof I'm still processing. Still human. Still in the fight.

The guilt eats at me, especially with the kids. I'm torn between begging for their love and building a wall so the next rejection doesn't crack my ribs. I wonder if moving forward means pretending they never existed. If that's the only way to stop the bleeding.

I can't. The heart doesn't work like that. It still beats for them. Even in absence. Even in silence.

So how do you keep going?

Maybe the answer lives in the space between surrender and stubbornness. Between grief and refusal. Moving forward doesn't mean erasing them or the damage. It means learning to carry both without letting either crush you. Building a life where love, regret, healing, and hope can share the same room.

Tonight, I reminded myself:

I'm not perfect. I'm trying.

I'm flawed. I'm real.

And even in the dark, there's light in the willingness to look. Strength in the refusal to quit. Hope in the parts that still want to connect.

This isn't just reflection. It's a contract with myself.

To keep fighting.

To keep creating.

To keep loving, even when it's hard.

To keep going.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN AN

EXPLANATION AND AN EXCUSE

There is a sentence I know some people will bring to this book.

Maybe they already have it ready.

Maybe they've had it ready since the introduction.

Maybe every page made them grip it tighter.

"He's just making excuses."

I know that sentence.

I've heard it from other people.

I've heard it from systems.

I've heard it from family.

I've heard it from shame.

Hell, I've said it to myself.

So let's deal with it directly.

This book is not an excuse.

It is an explanation.

And if you don't know the difference, you will punish the wrong thing and call it accountability.

An excuse says:

"It wasn't my fault, so I don't have to change."

An explanation says:

"This is how it happened, so now I know what has to change."

Those are not the same thing.

Not even close.

An excuse hides.

An explanation reveals.

An excuse avoids responsibility.

An explanation gives responsibility a map.

An excuse says:

“Leave me alone.”

An explanation says: “Now I can see the machinery.”

That is what I have been trying to do in these pages.

Not erase the damage.

Not clean up the wreckage with fancy trauma words.

Not wrap addiction in soft language so it doesn't look as ugly.

Not pretend my kids didn't get hurt.

Not pretend my choices didn't matter.

Not pretend that because I was wounded, I couldn't wound others.

I did wound others.

That is the truth.

I hurt people.

I failed people.

I lied.

I used.

I disappeared.

I froze.

I avoided.

I let shame drive.

I let substances drive.

I let fear make decisions that love should have made.

I failed my kids in ways I will carry for the rest of my life.

Maverick.

Shayla.

Teaguen.

Adalee.

They deserved a father who was present.

Regulated.

Safe.

Consistent.

They deserved a father who could carry pain without turning it into chaos.

They deserved a father who did not need a pipe, a pill, a bottle, a needle, or a work shift to survive his own nervous system.

They deserved a father who could show up without making his wounds the weather in the room.

They deserved better.

That sentence does not stop being true because I understand C-PTSD now.

Understanding does not erase impact.

It just explains the mechanism.

And mechanism matters because if I don't understand how the fire started, I'll keep carrying matches into dry rooms and calling the next blaze bad luck.

The Cheap Story

The cheap story is easy.

I was an addict.

I chose drugs.

I was selfish.

I didn't grow up.

I made myself worse.

I hurt my family.

Case closed.

That story is clean.

It fits in people's mouths.

It gives them someone to blame.

It lets everybody stop asking harder questions.

But cheap stories are usually built for comfort, not truth.

The truth is messier.

The truth is that addiction was not the first wound.

It was one of the loudest symptoms.

The truth is that meth did not appear in a healthy life and ruin it by itself. It found a nervous system already on fire.

It found grief.

It found shame.

It found abandonment terror.

It found years of pain with no off switch.

It found a body that had learned danger before safety.

It found a man who could not regulate and was trying to survive with whatever worked fast.

That does not make meth harmless.

It makes the hook understandable.

And if you refuse to understand the hook, you will never understand why “just stop” fails.

The cheap story says:

“He chose drugs over his family.”

The true story says:

“He loved his family and still reached for something destructive because his nervous system was drowning.”

Both parts matter.

The love does not erase the harm.

The harm does not erase the love.

That is the brutal middle where truth lives.

I did not stand there calmly choosing between my kids and drugs like two items on a shelf.

I was not weighing them evenly.

I was not saying, “This pipe matters more than my children.”

I was trying not to implode.

I was trying not to die inside.

I was trying to quiet a scream nobody else could hear.

That was real.

And so was the damage.

That is the difference between an explanation and an excuse.

The explanation says:

Here is why I reached for it.

Accountability says:

And here is what it cost.

Trauma Explains the Reflex

C-PTSD gave me reflexes.

Freeze.

Fawn.

Dissociation.

Hypervigilance.

Avoidance.

Rage.

Shutdown.

Self-medication.

Overperformance.

Isolation.

Those reflexes were not chosen the way people think choices are chosen.

They were trained.

Built.

Reinforced.

A glass box taught distance.

A blanket taught freeze.

Violence taught silence.

Loss taught bracing.

Marriage taught self-erasure.

Drugs taught relief.

Systems taught shame.

That is the machinery.

But machinery does not mean I get to walk away from responsibility. If a machine keeps throwing sparks, you don't blame the sparks and keep using it the same way.

You shut it down.

You open it.

You repair what you can.

You stop pretending the fire is mysterious.

That is what this book is.

Opening the machine.

Not because I want applause for surviving.

Not because I want immunity from consequences.

Because if I keep calling every symptom a moral failure, I never get to the mechanism.

And if I never get to the mechanism, I never change the pattern.

I cannot fix "I'm just bad."

There is no repair plan for that.

But I can work with:

I freeze under pressure.

I fawn when I fear abandonment.

I dissociate when shame floods me.

I avoid when systems feel threatening.

I crave substances when my nervous system needs fast relief.

I overwork when grief gets too loud.

I hide when I feel exposed.

Those are targets.

Those can be interrupted.

Those can be repaired.

Those can be practiced against.

That is why explanation matters.

Not to get me off the hook.

To finally show me where the hook is.

Accountability Without Self-Murder

For years, I thought accountability meant beating myself bloody on the inside.

I thought if I hated myself enough, that proved I understood the damage.

I thought if I called myself every ugly name first, nobody else could hurt me with it.

I thought shame was honesty.

It wasn't.

Shame was another addiction.

A familiar one.

A painful one.

A socially acceptable one.

People love a man who hates himself for his mistakes because it looks like remorse.

Sometimes it is remorse.

Sometimes it is just collapse.

There is a difference.

Healthy accountability says:

I did harm.

I need to face it.

I need to repair what I can.

I need to change the behavior.

I need to understand the pattern.

I need to accept that forgiveness is not owed to me.

Shame says:

I am harm.

I ruin everything.

I should disappear.

There is no point.

Everyone would be better off without me.

That is not accountability.

That is self-murder with a moral costume.

And it does not repair anything.

It just creates more wreckage.

When shame takes over, I stop moving.

I hide.

I avoid.

I numb.

I use.

I disappear.

I make the damage worse because I cannot stand to look at it.

Real accountability requires staying present.

That is harder than hating myself.

It is easier to collapse than to change.

It is easier to say "I'm a piece of shit" than to make the phone call.

It is easier to drown in guilt than to show up consistently for six months.

It is easier to punish myself than to become trustworthy.

Punishment can happen in a moment.

Trust takes repetition.

That is why I do not trust shame anymore.

I trust behavior.

What I Own

I own the drug use.

I own the lies that came with it.

I own the times I disappeared.

I own the fear I caused.

I own the instability.

I own the broken trust.

I own the times my kids saw less of me than they deserved.

I own the times I let shame make me smaller instead of braver.

I own the times I froze and then avoided the consequences.

I own the times I used my pain as a wall, even when I didn't mean to.

I own the fact that being wounded did not give me permission to wound.

That is mine.

No therapist can take that from me.

No diagnosis can erase it.

No explanation can soften it enough to make it disappear.

But I will not own what was never mine.

I will not own being born into danger.

I will not own the glass box as a moral failure.

I will not own the violence I witnessed as something I caused.

I will not own the manipulation that trained me to doubt myself.

I will not own other people's cruelty as proof that I deserved it.

I will not own the stigma that told me pain made me weak.

I will not own the idea that my nervous system adapting to hell means I am worthless.

That distinction saved something in me.

Because if I own everything, I drown.

If I own nothing, I never change.

Healing lives in the honest middle.

This is mine.

That was not.

This caused harm.

That caused injury.

This must change.

That must be grieved.

The Kids Deserved Better

This is the part I cannot talk around.

My kids deserved better.

Not because I did not love them.

Because love by itself was not enough.

That sentence hurts more than almost anything.

I wanted love to be enough.

I wanted the fact that my heart beat their names to count as protection.

But love without regulation can still create chaos.

Love without consistency can still feel unsafe.

Love without sobriety can still break trust.

Love without repair can still leave wounds.

I loved them.

And I failed them.

Both are true.

That is the sentence I have to keep standing inside.

Not to punish myself.

To stay honest.

They do not need me to turn my trauma into a courtroom speech.

They do not need me to explain so much that their pain gets buried under mine.

They do not need me to demand understanding before they are ready.

They do not need me to make them responsible for forgiving me. They need truth.

They need time.

They need safety.

They need consistency.

They need a father who can carry his own grief without handing it to them like homework.

So when I explain C-PTSD, I am not saying:

“You have to forgive me now.”

I am saying:

“I finally understand what was happening inside me, and I am responsible for doing something different with that understanding.”

That is all I can do.

That is the work.

Repair Is Not a Speech

I used to think if I could explain myself perfectly, maybe the damage would hurt less.

Maybe if they understood the nervous system, the addiction, the freeze, the shame, the grief, the whole machine, then maybe the past would loosen.

Maybe.

But explanation is not repair.

Explanation can open a door.

Behavior has to walk through it.

Repair is not one emotional conversation.

It is not one apology.

It is not one chapter.

It is not one breakthrough.

Repair is repetition.

Showing up.

Telling the truth.

Not using.

Keeping appointments.

Facing health problems.

Answering the message.

Making the call.

Respecting boundaries.

Not forcing closeness.

Not collapsing when someone is angry.

Not disappearing because shame got loud.

Not making promises I cannot keep.

Repair is boring compared to destruction.

That is why it is hard.

Fire is dramatic.

Repair is daily.

Fire gets attention.

Repair gets tested quietly.

Fire happens fast.

Repair asks who you are when nobody is clapping.

That is where accountability lives.

In the unglamorous repeat.

I Don't Get to Choose the Consequences

Another hard truth:

I do not get to choose how people feel about what I did.

I can explain.

I can apologize.

I can change.

I can stay sober.

I can show up.

I can become safer.

But I do not get to demand a certain response.

I do not get to demand forgiveness.

I do not get to rush trust.

I do not get to say, "But I understand now," and expect that to erase years of impact.

Understanding came late.

That is not their fault.

Some people may never see me differently.

Some relationships may never fully come back.

Some bridges may stay burned no matter how much water I carry now.

That hurts.

But accountability means accepting that too.

Not using it as an excuse to give up.

Not turning rejection into proof that change does not matter.

Not saying, "Well, if they won't forgive me, why try?"

That is shame trying to hijack the work.

The work still matters.

Even if nobody applauds.

Even if nobody trusts it at first.

Even if repair takes longer than I want.

Even if some people never come back.

Because change is not only about getting people back.

It is about becoming someone who stops creating the same wreckage.

The Real Apology

A real apology has no hook in it.

That is what I am learning.

It does not fish for comfort.

It does not demand forgiveness.

It does not turn the other person into the caretaker of my shame.

It does not say:

“I’m sorry, but you have to understand what happened to me.”

It says:

“I am sorry. You did not deserve that. I am working to change the pattern.”

The explanation can come later if they want it.

The accountability has to stand even if they don’t.

That is hard for a man whose nervous system hears anger as abandonment.

It is hard to let someone be hurt without rushing to defend yourself.

It is hard to let someone have their truth without trying to manage their perception of you.

It is hard to stay present when shame says run.

But that is repair.

Staying.

Listening.

Owning.

Not collapsing.

Not attacking.

Not disappearing.

That is the grown work.

That is the work trauma delayed but does not excuse me from learning.

Explanation Gives Direction

The reason I needed explanation was not to escape responsibility.

It was because shame gave me no direction.

Shame just said:

You're bad.

You're broken.

You ruin everything.

You should hide.

You should die.

That did not help me become better.

It made me worse.

Explanation gave me handles.

It showed me where to put my hands.

If freeze is part of the pattern, I can build supports before pressure hits.

If shame triggers avoidance, I can name shame early.

If cravings mean my nervous system is seeking relief, I can ask what state I am trying to escape.

If court triggers collapse, I can ask for written steps, reminders, support, and structure.

If conflict triggers fawning, I can slow down and find my boundary.

If grief drives me toward numbness, I can reach for people, writing, movement, breath, or anything safer than the old rescue boat.

That is why explanation matters.

Because it turns a curse into a map.

Not a perfect map.

Not an easy one.

But enough to stop walking blind.

The Line I Will Not Cross

I will explain the fire.

I will not worship it.

I will explain the wound.

I will not use it as a weapon.

I will explain the addiction.

I will not romanticize it.

I will explain the freeze.

I will not pretend consequences disappeared.

I will explain the shame.

I will not let it run my life.

I will explain the trauma.

I will not hand it the steering wheel forever.

That is the line.

The past gets context.

It does not get control.

The wound gets compassion.

It does not get permission to keep wounding.

The explanation gets a place at the table.

It does not get to eat the whole meal.

That is what I mean when I say I am aligned.

Not healed.

Aligned.

I can see the difference now.

Between injury and excuse.

Between shame and accountability.

Between survival and repair.

Between understanding myself and letting myself off the hook.

And I am not here to get off the hook.

I am here to finally understand why the hook kept finding me.

So I can stop bleeding on everyone who gets close.

That is the work.

That is the difference.

And if someone still wants to call this an excuse after all that, then maybe they were never looking for truth.

Maybe they were looking for a punishment that felt simple.

I am done living inside simple punishment.

I need something harder now.

CHAPTER 20

Truth.

Responsibility.

Repair.

A life that does not keep proving shame right.

That starts with understanding the fire.

Then choosing, one decision at a time, not to feed it.

WHAT I DO DIFFERENTLY NOW

This is the chapter where a fake book would pretend everything is fixed.

This is where the music would swell.

The man would be sober forever.

The kids would understand.

The court stuff would disappear.

The body would calm down.

The shame would lose its voice.

The fire would become a candle in the window.

Clean.

Pretty.

False.

That is not my story.

I am not writing a movie ending.

I am writing the truth.

The truth is, I still struggle.

Meth is still a fight.

Isolation still pulls.

Shame still knows how to find me.

My body still misfires.

My nervous system still treats ordinary life like incoming fire.

I still have days where the old rescue boat looks familiar.

I still have moments where disappearing feels easier than explaining.

I still have grief that shows up without asking.

I still have health problems that require attention.

I still have relationships that need repair.

I still have consequences from years of survival turning destructive.

So no, I am not healed.

But I am not blind anymore.

That is the difference.

Before, I was burning and calling it life.

Now, when the smoke starts, I look for the fuel.

That is what I do differently.

I Name the Alarm

The first thing I do differently is name the alarm.

Before, when panic hit, I thought it was truth.

If my chest tightened, something must be wrong.

If someone went quiet, they must be leaving.

If a court date was coming, disaster was guaranteed.

If a craving hit, relief was the only option.

If shame spoke, I believed it.

Now I try to pause long enough to say:

This is the alarm.

Not the whole truth.

Just the alarm.

That pause matters.

It does not always stop the reaction.

Sometimes the alarm still wins.

Sometimes I still freeze.

Sometimes I still spiral.

Sometimes I still want to run from my own life.

But naming it creates space.

A small space.

A breath-wide space.

And sometimes that is enough to keep me from obeying the first impulse.

The alarm says:

Disappear.

I try to answer:

Not yet.

The alarm says:

Use.

I try to answer:

What pain are you trying to quiet?

The alarm says:

They hate you.

I try to answer:

Maybe. Maybe not. Check the facts.

The alarm says:

You are nothing.

I try to answer: That is shame talking.

Not truth.

That is not magic.

It is practice.

And practice is how a nervous system learns.

I Try to Catch Freeze Earlier

Freeze used to own me before I even knew it was happening.

Court dates.

Phone calls.

Appointments.

Conflict.

Paperwork.

Messages.

Anything with pressure could lock me down.

Then shame would come in and call the freeze laziness.

That made everything worse.

Now I try to catch it earlier.

Not perfectly.

Earlier.

There are signs.

The blank mind.

The heavy body.

The tight chest.

The sudden urge to sleep.

The feeling that the phone weighs a hundred pounds.

The sense that the next step disappeared.

The old belief:

I'll deal with it later.

Later was usually where things went to rot.

Now, when I notice that shutdown starting, I try to reduce the task.

Not solve the whole problem.

Just find the next tiny action.

Open the message.

Write the date down.

Set the reminder.

Ask someone to sit with me while I make the call.

Drive to the building even if I am scared.

Put the paperwork where I can see it.

Send one honest sentence instead of a perfect explanation.

Freeze wants the whole mountain to feel impossible.

Recovery asks for one step.

That is what I do differently.

One step before shame buries the trail.

I Treat Cravings Like Information

A craving used to feel like a command.

Like something inside me had already decided.

The body wanted relief, and the old boat was right there.

Fast.

Familiar.

Effective.

Deadly.

Now I try to treat cravings like information.

Not permission.

Information.

What state am I in?

Am I tired?

Ashamed?

Lonely?

Overstimulated?

Grieving?

Angry?

Frozen?

Scared?

Do I need sleep?

Food?

A person?

A shower?

A walk?

A doctor?

A meeting?

A distraction that does not destroy me?

A craving is not just about the substance.

It is about the state underneath.

That does not make it easy.

Sometimes the craving still comes with teeth.

Sometimes it still tells me the old lie: Just this once.

You'll feel normal.

You can handle it.

You deserve relief.

Nobody cares anyway.

That voice knows me.

It knows my weak doors.

But now I know it too.

I know the rescue boat leaks.

I know fast relief sends a bill.

I know “normal” bought with poison does not stay normal.

I know one night can wake up the whole monster.

So I try to delay.

Breathe.

Move.

Talk.

Write.

Eat.

Sleep.

Call.

Anything that buys time.

Because cravings feed on urgency.

If I can slow the clock, I have a chance.

Not a guarantee.

A chance.

And sometimes a chance is the difference between relapse and one more night survived.

I Face the Body Instead of Hating It

I used to treat my body like the enemy.

The shaking.

The blood pressure.

The diabetes.

The low testosterone.

The sleep apnea.

The fatigue.

The gut problems.

The migraines.

The brain fog.

The panic.

The freeze.

I hated all of it.

It felt like betrayal.

Like my own body was proof I was defective.

Now I try to treat symptoms like warning lights.

Not character flaws.

Blood pressure is a warning light.

Blood sugar is a warning light.

Low testosterone is a warning light.

Sleep apnea is a warning light.

Exhaustion is a warning light.

Panic is a warning light.

Freeze is a warning light.

The body is not betraying me.

It is reporting.

It is telling me what years of emergency mode cost.

That means I have to listen.

Not perfectly.

But more honestly.

Take the medication.

Check the numbers.

Use the CPAP if that is the tool.

Keep the appointment.

Eat something that helps instead of punishes.

Move without turning movement into performance.

Rest without calling rest weakness.

Ask medical questions without shame.

A lab result does not get to name me.

A diagnosis does not get to reduce me.

But I do have to respond.

That is what I do differently.

I stop calling the warning light weakness and start asking what the machine needs.

I Don't Call Shame Accountability Anymore

This one is huge.

I used to think hating myself was proof I was taking responsibility.

Now I know better.

Shame is not accountability.

Shame is a trapdoor.

It drops me into the old basement where all the ugly voices live.

You ruined everything.

You are nothing.

You are too late.

You do not deserve repair.

Everyone would be better off without you.

That voice does not make me safer.

It makes me disappear.

So now, when shame comes in dressed like truth, I try to separate it.

What did I do?

What harm happened?

What can be repaired?

What pattern needs to change?

What is the next responsible step?

That is accountability.

Not:

I am garbage.

But:

This caused harm.

Do the next right thing.

Sometimes the next right thing is an apology.

Sometimes it is silence.

Sometimes it is giving someone space.

Sometimes it is showing up on time.

Sometimes it is not sending the emotional paragraph.

Sometimes it is staying sober.

Sometimes it is paying the bill.

Sometimes it is asking for help before collapse.

Sometimes it is accepting that the other person is still hurt and not making that about my

shame.

That is hard.

But it is cleaner.

Shame wants drama.

Accountability wants movement.

I am trying to choose movement.

I Apologize Without Asking to Be Rescued

I am learning that an apology is not a place to dump shame.

That was hard.

Because when I hurt someone and finally see it, the shame can get so loud that I want the other person to tell me I am not bad.

But that makes my apology another burden.

I do not want to do that anymore.

So I try to apologize cleaner.

I hurt you.

You did not deserve that.

I understand if you are angry.

I am working on the pattern.

I am not asking you to carry my shame.

That is the difference.

It does not mean I get it right every time.

I do not.

Sometimes I still overexplain.

Sometimes I still want understanding too fast.

Sometimes I still feel panic if someone stays hurt.

But now I can see it.

And seeing it gives me a chance to stop before I make their pain about me.

That is what I do differently.

I Respect Distance Without Calling It Death

Distance used to feel like death.

If someone pulled back, my nervous system heard abandonment.

If my kids were silent, shame filled in the blanks.

If someone needed space, I felt erased.

If a relationship changed, my body treated it like the end of the world.

That panic made me want to chase, explain, collapse, or disappear.

Now I am trying to learn that distance is not always death.

Sometimes distance is someone protecting their own nervous system.

Sometimes distance is a boundary.

Sometimes distance is time.

Sometimes distance is pain that has not healed yet.

Sometimes distance is the consequence of harm.

I do not have to like it.

But I have to respect it.

Especially with my kids.

Love does not mean forcing access.

Love does not mean demanding a response.

Love does not mean using my pain to pull them closer.

Love means becoming safe enough that if a door opens, I do not bring the fire with me.

That is hard.

Because I miss them.

Because I love them.

Because every silence can feel like punishment.

But I cannot heal our relationship by making them responsible for my abandonment wound.

That is mine to carry.

Mine to work on.

Mine to regulate.

They are my children.

Not my therapists.

Not my rescuers.

Not my proof that I am forgiven.

They are people with their own pain, their own memories, their own timing.

So I keep doing the work.

Not as a transaction.

As responsibility.

I Build Trust With Behavior

I do not trust promises the way I used to.

Not even mine.

I have made too many promises from emotional moments that my dysregulated body could not sustain.

So now I focus on behavior.

Small.

Repeatable.

Boring.

Real.

Keep the appointment.

Answer the message.

Tell the truth sooner.

Do not use.

Take the medication.

Check the number.

Make the call.

Write instead of explode.

Pause before reacting.

Come back after space.

Name the trigger.

Own the mistake.

Do the thing when nobody is watching.

That is how trust gets built.

Not with one big speech.

Not with one emotional breakthrough.

Not with one perfect apology.

With evidence.

Over time.

Predictable behavior is the only language a burned nervous system believes.

Mine included.

If I want people to trust me, I have to become predictable enough that their nervous systems can believe the data.

That takes time.

I do not get to rush it.

I Stop Making Pain the Whole Room

My pain is real.

But it does not get to become the whole room anymore.

That is another thing I am learning.

C-PTSD can make pain loud.

It can fill every corner.

It can make the current feeling seem like the only truth.

But if I let my pain take over the room, other people disappear.

Their needs disappear.

Their hurt disappears.

Their boundaries disappear.

Their truth disappears.

I have done that before.

I do not want to keep doing it.

So now I try to ask:

Is this conversation about my pain, or am I making it about my pain?

Is this person trying to tell me they are hurt?

Can I hear them without defending?

Can I stay present without collapsing?

Can I let two truths exist?

I was wounded.

And I caused wounds.

That is the grown work.

Not easy.

Necessary.

I Look for the Fuel Before the Fire

The biggest difference now is that I look for the fuel.

Before, I only saw the fire.

The relapse.

The fight.

The missed court date.

The shutdown.

The disappearing.

The blowup.

The shame spiral.

Now I ask what came before it.

What was the set?

What was the spark?

What did I miss?

Was I exhausted?

Was I grieving?

Was I overstimulated?

Was I feeling rejected?

Was I under pressure?

Was I hungry?

Was I ashamed?

Was I isolated?

Was I trying to be strong instead of honest?

That question changes everything.

Because if I can see the fuel, I have a chance to move it before the spark hits.

That is not always possible.

Sometimes I catch it too late.

Sometimes the fire still starts.

But even then, I can study the ashes.

Not to punish myself.

To learn.

What happened right before this?

Where did I stop being honest?

Where did I need support and choose silence?

Where did I ignore the warning light?

Where did shame take over?

That is how the pattern changes.

Not through one heroic choice.

Through thousands of small interruptions.

I Let Healing Be Ugly

Healing is ugly.

People do not like that.

They want healing to look peaceful.

Clean.

Inspirational.

Like morning sunlight and journals and a man smiling at the horizon.

Sometimes healing is that.

Sometimes healing is sweating through a craving at 2 a.m.

Sometimes it is crying in a parking lot before an appointment.

Sometimes it is taking blood pressure when you already know the number might scare you.

Sometimes it is not sending the angry text.

Sometimes it is apologizing and getting no response.

Sometimes it is choosing food instead of chemicals.

Sometimes it is sitting with shame without letting it drive.

Sometimes it is doing one responsible thing while every cell in your body wants to disappear.

Healing is not always beautiful.

But it is honest.

And honest is better than pretty.

I Stay

That may be the simplest difference.

I stay.

Not always physically in the same place.

Not always in the same conversation.

Not always in the same relationship.

But in life.

In the work.

In the truth.

In the next step.

Before, when shame got loud, I wanted out.

Out of the room.

Out of the relationship.

Out of the responsibility.

Out of my body.

Out of existence.

Now I try to stay long enough for the wave to pass.

One breath.

One minute.

One call.

One door between me and the old weapon.

One night.

One choice.

Stay does not mean endure abuse.

Stay does not mean ignore boundaries.

Stay does not mean let people hurt you.

Stay means do not let shame make the final decision.

Stay means do not confuse a feeling with forever.

Stay means give the next version of yourself a chance to exist.

That is what I do differently.

I stay.

The Proof Is Not Perfect

The proof of change is not that I never struggle.

The proof is that I see the struggle differently.

I know the names now.

Freeze.

Fawn.

Dissociation.

Hypervigilance.

Shame.

Craving.

Attachment panic.

Executive shutdown.

That language does not fix me.

But it gives me handles.

It gives me a way to grab the moment before it grabs me.

Sometimes.

That is enough to build on.

I am not asking anyone to believe I am a different man because I wrote a book.

A book is not proof.

Behavior is proof.

Time is proof.

Consistency is proof.

Repair is proof.

Staying alive and doing the next right thing when nobody is watching is proof. That is what comes next.

Not a bow.

A practice.

The Next Chapter Is Lived

This book can only take me so far.

Words matter.

They gave me language.

They gave me a map.

They turned smoke into shape.

But the next chapter is not written on paper.

It is lived.

In appointments kept.

In cravings survived.

In blood pressure checked.

In blood sugar owned.

In boundaries held.

In apologies made clean.

In silence respected.

In shame named.

In one less lie.

In one less fire.

In the way I show up when nobody is forcing me.

That is what I do differently now.

Not everything.

Not perfectly.

But enough to say the story is moving.

For most of my life, I thought change meant becoming someone else.

Now I think change means finally becoming responsible for the man who survived.

Not hating him.

Not excusing him.

Not worshipping his pain.

Leading him.

Teaching him.

Correcting him.

Protecting others from his unhealed reflexes.

Giving him better tools than the ones that almost killed him.

That is the work now.

And it is not dramatic.

It is daily.

The fire taught me how to survive.

Now I have to learn how to live without feeding it.

That is what I do differently.

I look at the ember and stop asking it to become an inferno.

I give it space.

I give it air.

I give it boundaries.

I give it truth.

And one day at a time, I build a life around warmth instead of destruction.

FINAL THOUGHT

THE EMBER THAT STAYED

The storm hit.

The fire burned.

The wreckage is real.

None of it is erased.

None of it is excused.

But it is mapped now.

That matters.

For years, I lived inside a machine I could not see.

The glass box wired distance.

The blanket taught freeze.

The losses trained my predictive model.

The marriage turned shame into a language.

The drugs became a rescue boat.

The stigma became a second wound.

The body never got the all-clear.

The court system recorded the fallout.

Connection became threat management.

And through all of it, I kept thinking the same thing:

Something is wrong with me.

That was the lie.

Not because I did no harm.

I did.

Not because I was innocent.

I wasn't.

Not because trauma makes every choice disappear.

It doesn't.

The lie was that the damage meant I was beyond understanding.

Beyond repair.

Beyond humanity.

That lie almost killed me.

Now I know better.

I am not healed.

I am aligned.

And alignment is not small.

Alignment means I can finally see what I'm fighting.

It means when the alarm screams, I know it is an alarm.

It means when shame speaks, I do not have to call it truth.

It means when my body freezes, I can recognize survival instead of calling myself lazy.

It means when the craving comes, I can ask what pain is looking for relief.

It means when connection feels dangerous, I can slow down before I turn fear into fire.

It means when I fail, I can own it without letting shame drag me back into the grave.

That is not a cure.

It is a direction.

And direction is more than I had for most of my life.

Healing is not a straight road out of hell.

It is a spiral.

You pass the same wounds again.

The same triggers.

The same grief.

The same shame.

The same old exits calling your name.

But each time, if you are doing the work, you pass them with a little more language.

A little more space.

A little more choice.

A little more ability to say:

I know this place.

I do not have to burn it down again.

That is resilience.

Not invincibility.

Not being unbreakable.

Not pretending the past doesn't hurt.

Resilience is standing again.

Even hunched.

Even bleeding.

Even embarrassed.

Even late.

Even after relapse.

Even after failure.

Even after another wave of grief pulls your feet out from under you.

It is the quiet refusal to let the worst thing be the last thing.

I still have work to do.

Meth is still a fight.

Maybe the biggest dragon left.

Isolation still pulls.

Shame still knows my address.

My nervous system still misfires.

My body still carries the cost.

My relationships still need repair.

My kids still deserved better.

I will not put a bow on that.

This ain't a triumph story.

I told you that at the beginning.

But it is not a death sentence either.

That is what changed.

For a long time, I thought the ember meant the fire was still dangerous.

Now I know different.

The ember means something survived.

Not untouched.

Not innocent.

Not clean.

But alive.

And alive is enough ground to rebuild from.

If you are reading this and you see your own storm in mine, hear me:

Your pain is valid.

Your survival responses make sense.

Your shame is not the whole truth.

The thing you reached for may have hurt you, but that does not mean you were trying to die.

Maybe you were trying to live with the only tools you had.

That matters.

But now comes the harder part.

Finding better tools.

Owning the damage.

Facing the body.

Naming the shame.

Learning to stay.

Letting people help without making them your savior.

Building trust with behavior instead of promises.

Choosing one small repair before the next fire starts.

That is the path.

Not easy.

Not clean.

Not fast.

But real.

The storm outside shaped me.

The fire within nearly consumed me.

But the ember stayed.

And now I am building a place where it can burn without destroying everything around it.

One day at a time.

One breath.

One honest step.

One less lie.

One less fire.

The ember does not need fuel.

It needs space.

I am building that space.

And for today, that is enough.

Appendix A: Research Notes and Analysis

This appendix is not here to make my story sound smarter.

It is here because testimony needs a backbone.

I lived the fire first.

Then I found the language.

The research did not create my pain. It helped explain why the pain had a pattern.

For years, I thought I was just defective.

Lazy.

Toxic.

Weak.

Crazy.

An addict.

A man who could not get his shit together.

But when I started looking at the science, the clinical language, the nervous system research, the trauma models, the addiction theories, and the patterns in my own life, a different picture started forming.

Not a prettier picture.

A clearer one.

The point of this appendix is not to diagnose every piece of my life like a lab report.

It is to show the machinery behind the wreckage.

Because once you can name the mechanism, shame loses some of its power.

CLINICAL ASSESSMENT FINDINGS / TEST

RESULTS

The clinical picture lines up with severe complex trauma.

Not one bad day.

Not one event.

A lifetime pattern.

The main findings were:

Severe C-PTSD

Complex trauma from chronic, interpersonal, developmental, and repeated stressors.

Major Depressive Disorder

Recurrent and trauma-linked, tied to shame, grief, collapse, isolation, and nervous system exhaustion.

Substance Use Disorder

Opioids, stimulants, alcohol. Not simply “partying.” Not just bad choices. A long pattern of functional dependency turning into crisis use.

Sleep Architecture Disruption

Sleep paralysis, night terrors, screaming in sleep, broken rest, obstructive sleep apnea, and the body never fully standing down.

Medical Stress Load

High blood pressure, diabetes, low testosterone, fatigue, gut issues, migraines, and other body-level consequences that make more sense when viewed through chronic stress and long-term dysregulation.

This does not mean every symptom has one simple cause.

Life is not that clean.

Genetics matter.

Choices matter.

Environment matters.

Substances matter.

Sleep matters.

Food matters.

Medical care matters.

But the trauma pattern gives the whole picture context.

It shows why the body kept acting like danger was still present.

It shows why relief became addictive.

It shows why shame got so loud.

It shows why systems that demanded compliance often triggered collapse instead.

This is not diagnostic overreach.

It is clinical alignment.

My history, symptoms, therapy, body responses, substance use, relational patterns, and legal failures all point toward one central truth:

My system was not built around peace.

It was built around survival.

LIST OF DECEASED INDIVIDUALS

SUMMARY OF LOSSES

Grief was not occasional in my life.

It was a pattern.

A timeline.

A second nervous system.

Every name below mattered.

Every name left a mark.

This list is not here for drama.

It is here because the body counts losses even when the mind tries to keep moving.

Twenty-three dead.

Twenty-three ruptures.

Twenty-three reasons my predictive model learned tragedy as baseline.

Sylvie Dean Kraus — 1988

Nicholas D. Williams — 1999

Thomas Paul Williams — 2000

Herbert William Lingar — 2001

Judy Ann Lingar — 2003

Argie Faye Williams — 2004

Ashley Nicole Williams — 2005

Warren Wade Ellett — 2007

Chad Argus Acord — 2011

William Garrett Lingar — 2011

Daniel Lee Stewart — 2011

Jerry Don Williams — 2012

Justin Dean Phillips — 2015

Todd Anthony Lingar — 2015 Marie Elizabeth Lingar — 2017

Gabriel Allen Woods — 2018

Jason Jones — 2019

Paula Faye Pitts — 2020

John Wesley Robinson — 2020

Patricia Lynn Lingar — 2021

Deanna Lynn Teague — 2021

Clint Lee Larrison — 2022

Joseph David Middleton — 2024

Billy Aaron Dean Woods — 2025

That list is not just grief.

It is training.

It trained my brain to expect the phone call.

It trained my body to brace.

It trained my nervous system to mistrust calm.

It trained me to treat good moments like temporary shelter.

People call that negative thinking.

I call it a body shaped by evidence.

LEGAL TIMELINE AND PATTERN ANALYSIS

The legal record tells one kind of story.

Driving suspended.

Failure to Appear.

Failure to Comply.

Warrants.

Compliance attempts.

Collapse.

Repeat.

On paper, it looks like defiance.

A man who would not follow rules.

A man who did not care.

A man who kept creating consequences for himself.

But paper has no nervous system.

Paper does not show freeze.

Paper does not show panic.

Paper does not show dissociation.

Paper does not show the body locking up before a court date.

Paper does not show the shame spiral after failure.

The main legal pattern was:

CKTR-C-21-1132 / CKS-22-250

Driving suspended → FTA / FTC cascade → warrant issuance → attempts at compliance freeze-triggered non-compliance → repeat cycle.
→

That is the external record.

The internal mechanism was different.

Stress activated survival responses.

Court and probation demands required executive function.

My executive function collapsed under threat.

Then failure created shame.

Shame made the next attempt harder.

That is the loop:

Pressure.

Freeze.

Failure.

Consequence.

Shame.

Avoidance.

More pressure.

More freeze.

The consequences were real.

I am not denying that.

But the mechanism was physiological.

Not because I was above accountability.

Because my nervous system was below regulation.

That difference matters.

A trauma-informed system would still hold me accountable.

But it would also understand that compliance requires capacity.

If the body is in threat mode, capacity drops.

If shame is the main tool, capacity drops further.

If the person freezes under pressure, pressure alone does not create follow-through.

It creates more freeze.

That is not an excuse.

It is a design flaw in how systems respond to trauma.

RESEARCH ANCHORS

These are the main research areas that helped me understand the machinery.

Again, the research does not make my story true.

My body lived it.

The research helped explain why the body reacted the way it did.

VLBW / NICU LONG-TERM OUTCOMES

Very Low Birth Weight and early NICU experiences can affect later development.

Not for every person.

Not in the same way.

But the risk patterns matter.

Research connects very early medical stress, prematurity, and low birth weight with higher risks in areas like:

Anxiety.

Depression.

Stress sensitivity.

Attachment insecurity.

Sensory sensitivity.

Attention and executive function issues.

Emotional regulation problems.

Altered stress response.

For me, that matters because my first world was not arms and safety.

It was glass.

Wires.

Alarms.

Distance.

Medical survival.

The Glass Box Blueprint is my way of explaining how that early environment may have shaped the starting point of my nervous system.

Not destiny.

Not a free pass.

A starting blueprint.

A system already set closer to danger than calm.

C-PTSD NEUROBIOLOGY

C-PTSD is not just “bad memories.”

It affects the whole system.

The body keeps responding like the threat is still happening.

Core mechanisms include:

Amygdala hyperactivity

The threat detector stays sensitive.

Prefrontal cortex suppression under stress

The thinking brain goes offline when survival mode takes over.

HPA axis dysregulation The stress hormone system gets stuck in unhealthy rhythms.

Freeze and dissociation

The body protects itself by shutting down, numbing, or disconnecting.

Hypervigilance

Constant scanning for danger.

Emotional flashbacks

The body re-enters old states without always showing clear visual memories.

Attachment disruption

Connection feels both necessary and dangerous.

That explains so much of my life.

Why conflict felt lethal.

Why stores felt like arenas.

Why court dates triggered collapse.

Why grief turned into shutdown.

Why I could know what to do and still not do it.

Why my body reacted before my mind understood the trigger.

I was not simply “overreacting.”

I was reacting from old wiring.

ADDICTION AND SELF-MEDICATION Substance use was not the root wound.

It became one of the loudest symptoms.

The self-medication model helped me understand why substances hooked so deeply.

Booze quieted the shakes.

Pills muted pain.

Meth broke through freeze.

Work drowned out grief.

Each one changed my internal state.

That is the key.

The addiction was not only about chasing pleasure.

It was about regulating unbearable states.

Panic.

Shame.

Grief.

Pain.

Dread.

Emptiness.

Freeze.

A trauma body reaches for what works fastest.

That does not make it safe.

That does not make it harmless.

That does not erase what I did.

But it changes the question from:

“Why did you choose drugs over your family?”

to:

“What pain made drugs feel like survival?”

That question does not excuse.

It opens the door to real treatment.

Because if addiction is partly regulation, then recovery has to include safer regulation.

Not just punishment.

Not just lectures.

Not just shame.

The body needs a new way to come down.

DARK TRIAD MANIPULATION AND COERCIVE CONTROL

Manipulation is not always loud.

Sometimes it is surgical.

Love bombing.

Mirroring.

Gaslighting.

Devaluation.

Intermittent reinforcement.

Threats of abandonment.

Using kids as leverage.

Public denial.

Private dependence.

Making someone doubt their own reality.

Those patterns hit trauma wounds hard.

Especially attachment wounds.

Especially someone with fear of abandonment.

Especially someone already trained to fawn, freeze, and distrust himself.

When someone mirrors your pain, then uses that closeness to control you, it does not feel like manipulation at first.

It feels like being seen.

When someone alternates affection with rejection, the nervous system can become addicted to the cycle.

When someone tells you your reality is wrong long enough, you start outsourcing your own perception.

That is how a person becomes easier to control.

Not because they are stupid.

Because their nervous system is starving for safety and terrified of abandonment.

That does not remove my responsibility.

But it explains why certain dynamics hooked so deep.

RESILIENCE MODEL

Resilience is not being untouched.

It is not being bulletproof.

It is not always standing tall.

Sometimes resilience is still being here.

Still breathing.

Still trying.

Still naming the pattern.

Still choosing one repair.

Still getting up after the spiral.

The resilience model that makes sense to me is not a straight line.

It is a spiral.

You revisit the same wounds with slightly better tools.

One more breath.

One more appointment.

One more honest sentence.

One more craving survived.

One more apology without collapse.

One more boundary.

One more day where the alarm screams and you do not obey it.

Resilience is not pretending the fire never burned.

It is learning how to carry the ember without burning everything down.

Appendix B: Letters of Healing

LETTERS OF HEALING

Note: These aren't apologies. They're acknowledgments. Written to stop the loop, own the mechanics, and release the weight so the work can actually move forward.

To My Children (Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, Adalee)

I've spent too long letting the chaos inside me spill onto you. I'm sorry. This isn't an excuse. It's an explanation of the storm I carried and how it hurt you. You deserved a steady, present, safe father. Too often, I wasn't that.

From early on, my nervous system learned to brace for impact. Violence, loss, instability—it layered into a belief that I had to handle everything alone, that pain meant escape, that imperfection meant worthlessness. Those lies drove my mistakes: yelling, disappearing into substances, failing to show up. I thought hiding my pain protected you. It didn't. It isolated you. I hurt you, and I carry that daily.

Therapy and hard truth have stripped those lies down. Life isn't fair, but I'm learning to take the hit without breaking. Showing how I feel isn't weakness; it's how connection works. My worth isn't tied to my failures. Yours isn't either. I'm learning to regulate the fire so it doesn't burn you again.

You are my heart. My biggest regret is the pain I caused. My deepest hope is to rebuild. I don't expect trust overnight. I'm committed to earning it, day by day, by showing up honest, steady, and present. If you're angry or hurt, that's valid. I'm here when you're ready.

My fight is mine. But your existence is the fuel. I'm fighting for a future where I can be the father you deserved. You are never to blame for my struggles. I love you more than words can hold.

Always.

To Trinity

I'm writing this with clarity carved from years of therapy and nights choking on the ash of twenty years. This isn't about crucifying you or groveling. It's about naming the damage, owning my side, and burning the resentment so I can breathe for myself and our kids.

I came to you already fractured. NICU wiring, childhood violence, abandonment fear—I dragged that live wire into our marriage. We didn't build a partnership; we built a pressure cooker. I wasn't a saint. My rage detonated. I clung to substances when the pain roared louder than my coping skills. My oldest saw me breaking and asked why I stayed. I thought I hid it. Kids don't miss it. My choices poisoned your home. I'm gutted for failing them. For failing you.

But you weren't just collateral. You weaponized my fear. Used the kids as leverage. Kept them from me for years. Told them I chose drugs over them. That's a lie. Relapse isn't a preference; it's a nervous system screaming for equilibrium. C-PTSD doesn't make you narcissistic; it makes you convinced you're worthless. When I showed pain, you flipped it to yours. When I broke after Garrett's death, you told me to shut up. That wasn't just cold. It was erasure.

Hiding in closets to keep your family's approval wasn't humiliation. It was confirmation of the NICU's first lesson: Your presence is a problem. Disappear. Rehab in 2015 wasn't care; it was control. The divorce, the legal fallout, the courtroom purgatory—it all echoed the same message: you don't get to be here.

We fed each other's wounds. I own my part: the rage, the addiction, the failure to regulate. I'm sick with regret for the pain I caused Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, Adalee. Therapy showed me it's C-PTSD, not Bipolar. The wiring drove the spirals. Substances were a flawed escape, not a choice to hurt anyone.

I'm not asking for apologies or a rewrite. I'm owning my side so the resentment stops eating me alive. I see you as human, scarred by your own unseen wars. I'm fighting for sobriety, rewiring my brain, building a life that isn't ash. My kids are my north star. I'm clawing to be the father I owed them. I don't expect friendship. I'm asking for basic respect in co-parenting, not a war that keeps them from their dad. I'm burning the slaughterhouse to the ground. Walking into a future forged in healing, not hate.

To Kristina

Williston was a whirlwind that left me shattered. You came when I was raw—grieving my mom, my marriage, my kids. Your attention felt like a lifeline. You said, "I'm different." For a moment, I believed it.

Your withdrawal, the gaslighting, the calculated distance—it hit wounds I didn't know were open.

I reacted horribly. Rage texts. Cruel words. Self-harm to cope with the spiral. I lost focus at work.

I pushed toward therapy I wasn't ready for. I'm not proud of that desperation.

I used to think I couldn't survive abandonment, that you owed me loyalty, that hurting you would ease the pain. Those were lies rooted in a childhood of fear and a nervous system wired for panic. Therapy's shown me pain isn't unbearable. I've survived worse. Your manipulation was real, but my reactions were mine, driven by old wounds you knew how to press. I regret the harm I caused. The chaos I added.

I'm not here to ask for forgiveness. I'm owning my part and letting go of the anger. Your actions don't define me. I'm in therapy. Fighting for sobriety. Learning to handle emotion without destruction. My focus is on healing and being the dad my kids deserve. I hope you find your own peace.

To My Younger Self (Age 6)

I see you under that blanket. Hearing Mom scream. Heart hammering. It's not your fault. You're just a kid in a terrifying storm.

Back then, you learned to survive: Fear is too big. You're to blame. Stay small and silent. This will never end. Those thoughts made sense for a scared kid in danger. They aren't truth. Fear won't break you. The violence isn't your fault. Staying quiet kept you safe then, but you aren't helpless now. And that storm passes.

That terror wired you for fear, from the NICU to those nights of violence. It's why you feel everything so deeply. But that wiring doesn't define you. You aren't weak for freezing. You're tough as hell for making it through. The relief you felt when that man died? That's okay. It was your nervous system saying you deserved safety.

You'll carry this pain for a while. But you'll learn to set it down. You'll find ways to feel fear without hiding, to love without bracing for loss. Keep going. You've got a heart that won't quit.

I'm proud of you for surviving.

To My Addiction

You entered as relief. You stayed as wreckage. You felt like a friend. You became a master.

I didn't have the tools to handle the anxiety, the sensory overload, the unprocessed grief. You offered a way out. A temporary silencing of the storm. You felt like survival. But you lied. You didn't solve the pain; you buried it. You demanded everything: money, relationships, integrity, health, identity. You isolated me. You fueled the chaos. You stood between me and my kids. My reliance on you was my choice. Born of desperation. A nervous system overwhelmed. A mind lacking healthier coping strategies. I chose you over discomfort, over feeling, over responsibility. I chose you even when I knew you were killing me, because facing the pain you masked felt more terrifying than the wreckage you created.

Through therapy and recovery, I see you now. Not as a moral failure, but as a maladaptive copied mechanism tied directly to trauma. You exploited my pain, my wiring, my lack of tools.

You were a symptom that became a disease. The fight against you is daily. A constant battle against ingrained patterns and the urge to return to false comfort when stress hits.

I'm looking you in the eye and declaring I see you for what you are. I acknowledge the hold you had. I acknowledge the ongoing fight. But I'm no longer defining myself by you. My focus is on building a life resilient enough to face pain without your escape. Learning to regulate. To connect. To fight for sobriety, fueled by the life I'm building and the love for my kids you tried to extinguish. I'm releasing your grip, one day at a time. The fight continues. I'm no longer yours.

KEY POINTS SUMMARY / AUTHOR NOTES

These are the truths I want the reader to leave with.

Not because they are pretty.

Because they are useful.

Trauma responses are survival mechanics, not moral failures.

Freeze.

Fawn.

Dissociation.

Hypervigilance.

Avoidance.

Numbing.

Substance use.

Isolation.

Overperformance.

They may become destructive.

They may hurt people.

They may need to change.

But they started as survival.

You cannot heal a survival response by calling it weakness.

Accountability is not shame.

Shame says: You are bad.

Accountability says:

This caused harm. Now what are you going to do with the truth?

Shame collapses.

Accountability moves.

Shame hides.

Accountability repairs.

I need accountability.

I do not need more shame.

The nervous system regulates through repetition, not willpower.

You cannot yell a body into safety.

You cannot shame a brain out of freeze.

You cannot punish a nervous system into regulation.

The body needs repeated signals:

Safety.

Structure.

Predictability.

Repair.

Rest.

Connection.

Boundaries.

Honest follow-through.

That is how rewiring starts.

Connection requires calibration, not perfection.

Healthy connection is not intensity.

It is not rescue.

It is not love bombing.

It is not someone becoming your savior.

Connection is calibration.

A nervous system learning that closeness does not have to mean danger.

A relationship built through predictable behavior, repair, boundaries, and truth.

Healing is ongoing.

I am not healed.

I am aligned.

That means I can see the pattern now.

I can name the alarm.

I can recognize shame.

I can understand cravings.

I can see freeze before it becomes total collapse.

I can own harm without turning myself into garbage.

That is not the finish line.

It is direction.

And direction is enough to keep walking.

SURVIVAL TERMS IN PLAIN ENGLISH

This section is for anybody reading who does not speak trauma language yet.

I did not either.

I had to learn it late.

Here is the simple version.

C-PTSD

Complex Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.

Not just one trauma.

A nervous system shaped by repeated, prolonged, or inescapable trauma.

Especially trauma involving relationships, childhood, violence, neglect, control, abandonment, or chronic danger.

It affects identity, emotions, relationships, the body, and the ability to feel safe.

Nervous System Dysregulation The body cannot easily return to calm.

The alarm system gets stuck on.

A person may swing between panic, rage, numbness, shutdown, cravings, and exhaustion.

It is not “being dramatic.”

It is a body that does not know how to come down.

Hypervigilance

Constant scanning for danger.

Reading faces.

Tone.

Silence.

Movement.

Rooms.

Exits.

Messages.

Changes in mood.

It is exhausting.

But to a trauma body, it feels necessary.

Freeze

The body locks up when danger feels inescapable.

You may know what to do and still not be able to move.

It can look like laziness, defiance, or not caring.

Inside, it feels like shutdown.

Fawn

Keeping peace by erasing yourself.

Agreeing.

Apologizing.

Shrinking.

Staying quiet.

Trying to manage someone else's mood so they do not hurt you, leave you, or turn on you.

It can look like kindness.

Underneath, it is fear.

Dissociation

Leaving without leaving.

Your body is present, but your mind pulls back because the moment is too much.

You may feel numb, foggy, unreal, distant, or blank.

Memory can get patchy.

Emotional Flashback

The body enters an old emotional state even if you do not see a clear memory. Suddenly you feel small, terrified, ashamed, abandoned, or trapped.

The past shows up as a body state.

Executive Dysfunction

Trouble planning, organizing, remembering, prioritizing, or following through.

It gets worse under stress.

This is why simple tasks can feel impossible when the nervous system is overwhelmed.

Co-Regulation

A safe person helping your nervous system calm down through presence, steadiness, voice, warmth, and predictability.

Not rescuing.

Not fixing.

Helping the body remember safety.

Self-Regulation

Learning to calm, ground, and guide your own nervous system without substances, chaos, or another person carrying the whole load.

Breathing.

Movement.

Sleep.

Boundaries.

Naming feelings.

Pausing before reacting.

Asking for help before collapse.

Shame

The belief that you are bad.

Not that you did something bad.

That you are bad.

Shame hides.

Shame isolates.

Shame fuels addiction.

Shame makes repair feel impossible.

Accountability

Owning harm without turning yourself into garbage.

Looking at the wreckage and saying:

I did this.

I need to repair what I can.

I need to change the pattern.

I am still human.

The Rescue Boat Anything you reached for because your nervous system was drowning.

Booze.

Pills.

Meth.

Work.

Food.

Isolation.

Control.

Sex.

Chaos.

Some rescue boats keep you alive for a while.

Some start sinking.

Healing means building safer ones.

The Second Wound

The shame and stigma people add after the original trauma.

The original wound is what happened.

The second wound is being told your reaction means you are weak, crazy, selfish, lazy, immature, or worthless.

That wound can be deadly.

FINAL THOUGHT

THE EMBER THAT STAYED

The storm hit.

The fire burned.

The wreckage is real.

None of it is erased.

None of it is excused.

But it is mapped now.

That matters.

For years, I lived inside a machine I could not see.

The glass box wired distance.

The blanket taught freeze.

The losses trained my predictive model.

The marriage turned shame into a language.

The drugs became a rescue boat.

The stigma became a second wound.

The body never got the all-clear.

The court system recorded the fallout.

Connection became threat management.

And through all of it, I kept thinking the same thing:

Something is wrong with me.

That was the lie.

Not because I did no harm.

I did.

Not because I was innocent.

I wasn't.

Not because trauma makes every choice disappear.

It doesn't.

The lie was that the damage meant I was beyond understanding.

Beyond repair.

Beyond humanity.

That lie almost killed me.

Now I know better.

I am not healed.

I am aligned.

And alignment is not small.

Alignment means I can finally see what I'm fighting.

It means when the alarm screams, I know it is an alarm.

It means when shame speaks, I do not have to call it truth.

It means when my body freezes, I can recognize survival instead of calling myself lazy.

It means when the craving comes, I can ask what pain is looking for relief.

It means when connection feels dangerous, I can slow down before I turn fear into fire.

It means when I fail, I can own it without letting shame drag me back into the grave.

That is not a cure.

It is a direction.

And direction is more than I had for most of my life.

Healing is not a straight road out of hell.

It is a spiral.

You pass the same wounds again.

The same triggers.

The same grief.

The same shame.

The same old exits calling your name.

But each time, if you are doing the work, you pass them with a little more language.

A little more space.

A little more choice.

A little more ability to say: I know this place.

I do not have to burn it down again.

That is resilience.

Not invincibility.

Not being unbreakable.

Not pretending the past doesn't hurt.

Resilience is standing again.

Even hunched.

Even bleeding.

Even embarrassed.

Even late.

Even after relapse.

Even after failure.

Even after another wave of grief pulls your feet out from under you.

It is the quiet refusal to let the worst thing be the last thing.

I still have work to do.

Meth is still a fight.

Maybe the biggest dragon left.

Isolation still pulls.

Shame still knows my address.

My nervous system still misfires.

My body still carries the cost.

My relationships still need repair.

My kids still deserved better.

I will not put a bow on that.

This ain't a triumph story.

I told you that at the beginning.

But it is not a death sentence either.

That is what changed.

For a long time, I thought the ember meant the fire was still dangerous.

Now I know different.

The ember means something survived.

Not untouched.

Not innocent.

Not clean.

But alive.

And alive is enough ground to rebuild from.

But this book was never only about me.

If you made it this far, maybe you saw something.

Maybe you saw yourself.

Maybe you saw your father.

Your brother.

Your son.

Your husband.

Your wife.

Your mother.

Your patient.

Your client.

Your inmate.

Your employee.

Your veteran.

Your addict.

Your “problem person.”

Maybe you saw somebody you already gave up on.

Maybe you saw somebody you judged because it was easier than understanding them.

Maybe you saw yourself in the parts you were taught to hate.

The freeze.

The fawn.

The rage.

The relapse.

The shame.

The body that won't calm down.

The brain that keeps predicting disaster.

The need to disappear.

The rescue boat you keep reaching for even while it sinks.

If you did, then don't close this book and go back to sleep.

That is the call.

Don't go back to easy stories.

Don't go back to calling trauma laziness.

Don't go back to calling addiction selfishness without asking what pain made relief feel necessary.

Don't go back to calling freeze defiance.

Don't go back to telling men to "be a man" when what you really mean is "bleed quietly."

Don't go back to confusing silence with strength.

Don't go back to mistaking shame for accountability.

Don't go back to punishing symptoms while ignoring the wound. Because once you see the machinery, you are responsible for what you do with that sight.

That is the cliff.

That is where I am leaving you.

Not with my story tied shut.

With a question burning in your hands:

What happens now that you know?

If you are the one on fire, what are you going to reach for besides the thing killing you?

If you love someone on fire, can you hold a boundary without turning them into garbage?

If you work in a system, can you tell the difference between noncompliance and collapse?

If you are a parent, can you hear pain before it becomes behavior?

If you are a man, can you stop calling your own suffering weakness long enough to stay alive?

If you are carrying shame, can you ask whether it is telling the truth or just repeating the voices that wounded you?

This is where the book ends.

But this is not where the work ends.

The work starts when the page goes quiet.

When the phone rings.

When the craving hits.

When the court date comes.

When your kid asks the hard question.

When your body freezes.

When shame says, "You are nothing."

When the old rescue boat floats by and promises relief.

When the room gets quiet and your nervous system starts looking for danger.

That is where the real chapter starts.

Not on paper.

In the next choice.

One breath.

One interruption.

One honest sentence.

One apology without collapse.

One boundary without cruelty.

One night survived.

One call made.

One appointment kept.

One hand reaching for help instead of the old fire.

I used to think the fire was the end of the story.

It wasn't.

The fire was the evidence.

The ember is the question.

What will you do with what survived?

As for me, I am still here.

Still learning.

Still fighting.

Still carrying the names.

Still loving my kids.

Still facing the body.

Still listening for the alarm.

Still building the space where the ember can burn without consuming everything around it.

One day at a time.

One breath.

One honest step.

One less lie.

One less fire.

The storm outside shaped me.

The fire within nearly consumed me.

But the ember stayed.

And if the ember stayed, then the story is not over.

Not mine.

Not yours.

Not yet.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Daniel “Bret” Lingar is a writer from Clarksville, Arkansas, whose work focuses on trauma, addiction, Complex PTSD, shame, survival, and the long road back from self-destruction.

He writes from lived experience, not theory.

Born premature at three pounds, four ounces, Bret spent his first thirty days in an incubator, an experience that became one of the central images in his work: the glass box, the first distance, the body learning survival before safety. From there, his life moved through childhood violence, addiction, grief, fatherhood, legal collapse, isolation, and years of trying to understand why his nervous system felt like a fire alarm that would not shut off.

His writing is raw, direct, and trauma-informed. He does not write to excuse harm. He writes to explain the machinery behind it, to separate shame from accountability, and to give language to people who have spent their lives being called lazy, weak, crazy, selfish, or broken when their bodies were really fighting to survive.

Bret has over twenty years of experience in restaurant operations, maintenance, customer service, and high-pressure work environments. Those years taught him how trauma can hide behind performance, how overworking can become another rescue boat, and how a person can look functional while falling apart inside.

He is also the father of Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, and Adalee, whose names remain at the center of his healing work. This book is part memoir, part map, and part reckoning: a testimony of what happened, why it happened, what it cost, and what it means to keep choosing repair when shame says it is too late.

Bret is not writing from the finish line.

He is writing from the firebreak.

Still learning.

Still fighting.

Still here.

FROM TESTIMONY TO TOOLS

Today, Bret serves as the Director of Operations and lead developer for Capitol Contracts

LLC, where he has turned the survival strategies of a lifetime into a structured instructional system. He is the architect of the WRH (What Really Happened) Master Curriculum, a 75-session program designed to bridge the gap between clinical trauma theory and the raw reality of the veteran and survivor experience.

His mission is no longer just about his own survival, but about building the “firebreaks” for others. By stripping away the clinical jargon and speaking the language of the nervous system, he provides a roadmap for those still trapped in the “glass box” of their own trauma.

Whether he is writing outlaw country lyrics, drafting federal training modules, or advocating for veteran suicide prevention, the goal remains the same: to ensure that no one has to stay silent simply because they don't have the words.

"Silence is where the rot starts. My job is to turn the lights on so we can see the machinery for what it actually is."

Bret lives and works in the foothills of the Ozarks, proving every day that while you can't change the beginning of your story, you can damn sure choose how to write the rest of it.

— UNIQUE CONTENT FROM DRAFT —

Core passage for the attachment chapter

It wasn't that I couldn't "just let go."

People say that like letting go is a door handle.

Like you just open your hand and release whatever is hurting you.

That wasn't what it felt like inside me.

Letting go felt like death.

Not sadness.

Not disappointment.

Death.

Something in my body reacted to abandonment like it was the end of oxygen. Like if that person left, I didn't just lose the relationship — I lost the part of me that knew how to stay alive inside it.

That is hard to admit because it sounds wrong.

It sounds exaggerated.

It sounds like obsession.

Maybe from the outside, that is what it looked like.

But inside, it felt like survival.

When Garrett died, the grief was enormous. It tore through me. It left guilt behind that I still carried for years.

But Garrett was gone.

There was a terrible finality to it.

Abandonment was different.

Abandonment kept happening in real time.

It was the person still alive, still out there, still reachable, still choosing distance.

That kind of loss didn't close.

It stayed open and kept asking me to solve it.

That was why it felt worse than death
sometimes.

Not because they mattered more than my brother.

Because my nervous system could not stop treating their leaving as something I had to prevent.

If I could just say it right.

If I could just explain enough.

If I could just become what they needed.

If I could just fix the misunderstanding.

If I could just get one more conversation.

One more message.

One more chance.

Then maybe the death feeling would stop.

That was the trap.

I thought I was fighting for love.

Most of the time, I was fighting withdrawal from attachment.

I don't sleep in a bed.

Not really.

I sleep in a computer chair.

Before that, couches. Recliners. Anywhere that let me stay half-ready, half-upright, like part of me still needed to be available
if something happened.

I don't plan sleep.

I know I slept when I wake up.

That sounds strange if your body understands rest as safety.

Mine never did.

A bed felt too final unless someone safe was in it with me. Alone, it felt exposed.

Too open. Too still. Too much like surrender.

So I slept in places where sleep could happen by accident.

Chair.

Couch.

Recliner.

Places where I could pass out without admitting I was trying to rest.

I didn't know for years that this was a trauma response.

I just thought it was how I was.

FRONT MATTER

DEDICATION For Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, and Adalee.

You were never the reason I broke.

You were the reason I kept trying to make sense of something I didn't understand for a long time.

This book is not you carrying my pain.

It's me finally learning how to stop handing it down.

I love you more than anything in these pages.

Always.

CONTENT NOTE

This book contains direct discussion of Complex PTSD, childhood trauma, domestic violence, addiction, drug use, relapse, grief, suicidal thoughts, emotional abuse, family conflict, legal consequences, and recovery.

Some chapters describe traumatic events and substance use in plain language.

This book is not written to shock you.

It is written to tell the truth as it was lived.

That truth can still hit hard.

Read at your own pace. Pause when you need to. Skip what you need to. Come back when you can.

If anything in these pages brings up thoughts of self-harm, relapse, or feeling unsafe, reach out immediately. In the United States, call or text 988 for the Suicide & Crisis Lifeline. If you are in immediate danger, contact emergency services or go to the nearest emergency room.

You do not have to process everything at once.

One breath. One minute. One page at a time.

MEMOIR NOTE

Some names and identifying details have been changed to protect privacy. Events are drawn from memory and from my understanding of what happened at the time.

Where the book describes thoughts, emotions, or bodily experiences, those are written from lived experience as I remember it.

AUTHOR'S NOTE ON STRUCTURE

This book is not a traditional memoir, and it is not a straight-line recovery story.

It is written from inside lived experience, where memory does not arrive in order, and trauma does not behave in a linear way.

The content is raw. It includes grief, addiction, violence, shame, and the long-term effects of Complex PTSD as they actually played out in real life. Nothing is softened to make it easier to sit with.

But the structure is intentional.

Raw content. Controlled order.

The goal is not to reduce intensity, but to make it readable without changing what it felt like to live through it.

Certain experiences will reappear throughout the book—the NICU incubator, early childhood fear, the freeze response, addiction, relationship cycles, overfunctioning, and shame.

They are not repeated for emphasis.

They return because trauma returns in layers.

Each return deepens the understanding:

What happened.

What it taught my body.

How it shaped behavior and relationships.

How it was eventually understood.

The book moves in a spiral, not a straight line. The same wounds appear more than once, but never from the same place in the story.

The point is not to distance the reader from it.

It is to make it visible in full.

Let the content bleed. Let the structure hold.

INTRODUCTION

This isn't a triumph story. There's no bow on top. And it isn't a pity party either. I'm not asking for sympathy. I'm telling the truth about what it felt like to live inside a nervous system that never shut off for forty-three years.

My name is Daniel, though most people know me as Bret. I'm from Clarksville, Arkansas. I live with Complex PTSD. I lived with addiction. I've buried more people than I can explain cleanly, and I'm still here trying to understand what all of it did to a person's mind and body.

This book is the map I didn't have. It's the wreckage before it makes sense. It's also an attempt to understand the machinery underneath it all—why a life can keep collapsing even when the person inside it is trying to hold on.

It's about a three-pound baby in a glass box who learned early that survival meant distance. It's about a kid under a blanket learning that stillness was safer than movement. It's about drugs

CHAPTER 1 — THE STORM OUTSIDE that didn't start as escape, but as relief. It's about relationships that repeated patterns I didn't yet have language for.

It's also about my kids—Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, Adalee—who were never the cause of the damage, but lived inside its ripple.

I wrote this because silence doesn't clarify anything. It just keeps everything repeating in the dark.

This book doesn't try to clean it up. But it does try to hold it in a structure you can follow.

Raw content. Controlled order.

If you've ever lived with a mind that won't settle, if you've ever tried to outrun your own reactions, if you've ever looked at your life and thought why does this keep happening, this is what it looks like from the inside.

This isn't therapy.

It's testimony.

I didn't understand it at the time, but my life started in a place where survival came before anything else.

Seven months in, three pounds, four ounces. Straight into an incubator—glass walls, wires, alarms, and a kind of silence that didn't feel peaceful. No touch. No holding. Just machines deciding whether I stayed alive.

For the first month of my life, I didn't belong to anything outside that box.

A few days in, things got worse. My body started shutting down. They called a priest to my incubator. He gave me last rites while monitors screamed in the background.

Somewhere between those prayers and those alarms, something changed.

I didn't die.

I stayed.

That box became the first shape my nervous system learned: distance, stillness, survival without comfort.

Don't move too much.

Don't make noise.

Don't take up space.

I didn't know I was learning that. But my body did.

And it never really unlearned it.

I don't have memory of those first days, but I've spent my life living inside what they left behind.

There's a way my body reacts to space that I didn't learn later. It just exists. Too much closeness feels like pressure. Too much noise feels like danger. Even calm can feel suspicious, like something is about to break the surface without warning.

Back then I called it nothing. I didn't have language for it. I just knew I didn't settle the way other kids seemed to settle.

Years later, I'd understand that the body doesn't forget its first environment. Even if the mind does.

The next real shift came when I was five.

My parents split, and everything in the house changed shape. Not all at once. Slowly, then suddenly. The kind of change you don't get time to adjust to before it becomes normal.

Mom brought someone new into our lives. At first it was just presence. Then it became weight.

Then it became something heavier than that.

The house didn't feel safe anymore, but as a kid you don't question safety. You adapt to whatever is in front of you. You learn the patterns. You learn where to be quiet. You learn where to disappear.

By six, I was already good at disappearing.

I remember being under a blanket more than I remember being in rooms.

Not hiding in the dramatic sense people imagine. Just folding myself into stillness. Making myself small enough that nothing would notice me. Listening more than living. Waiting more than moving.

There were nights when the house changed sound completely. Voices rising. Things breaking. Footsteps that didn't feel like footsteps anymore.

And my body would do the same thing every time.

Lock.

Not choice. Not thought. Just instant shutdown. Like something inside me decided stillness was the safest option before I could even argue with it.

I didn't understand it then, but that response followed me everywhere later in life. Into conflict.

Into relationships. Into pressure. Into moments where I should have spoken and didn't. Into moments where I wanted to move forward and couldn't.

Back then it just felt like fear.

Now I know it was wiring.

One night stands out, not because it was different, but because it wasn't.

I remember the floor under me. The fabric of the blanket. The sound of something breaking in another room. And the distance between what was happening and where I was.

Like I was there, but not included in it.

That distance became familiar.

Familiar enough that later, when life got quieter, I didn't trust quiet. Quiet felt like the moment before something returns.

There were other moments too, quieter ones, that didn't look like trauma from the outside but lived like it on the inside.

Waiting at the bus stop in the mornings, I'd stand there before school with that same tightness in my chest. Other kids talked or joked or moved around like they belonged there. I just stayed still.

Watching. Listening. Feeling like I had to be ready for something I couldn't name.

Even normal didn't feel neutral. It felt temporary. Like it could shift at any second if I wasn't paying attention.

We didn't stay in that version of life forever. Things shifted again over time. The chaos changed shape, as it always does, but it didn't fully disappear. It just moved into different rooms, different people, different forms.

What didn't change was me inside it.

Still watching first.

Still freezing before reacting.

Still learning safety through silence instead of connection.

By the time I was older, I didn't think of it as trauma.

I thought it was just how life felt.

Uneasy. Unpredictable. Something you brace for without realizing you're bracing. I didn't know I was being shaped by it. I just knew I was always slightly behind everyone else in how easily they moved through the world.

School didn't fix that.

It amplified it.

Hallways felt too tight. Crowds felt too loud. People felt too close. Not in a dramatic way I could explain, just a constant pressure in my chest like my body was always waiting for something to happen.

I wasn't present the way other kids were present.

I was scanning.

Always scanning.

That became the pattern.

CHAPTER 2

Not because I chose it.

Because my body learned early that awareness was safer than trust.

And once a body learns that, it doesn't stop on command.

It carries it forward.

Even when nothing is happening anymore.

THE FIRE IGNITES

The storm died down by my teens, but peace never really came.

Not real peace. Not the kind where your body unclenches and trusts the room it's in.

The outside got quieter, but something inside me stayed lit.

Jumpy.

Sharp.

Hot under the skin.

By then I didn't have the language for it. I didn't know what a nervous system was. I didn't know what hypervigilance meant. I didn't know trauma could sit inside you like it belonged there.

All I knew was I couldn't relax.

School felt like pressure from every direction.

Crowded hallways. Lockers slamming. Voices bouncing off cinderblock walls. Fluorescent lights buzzing overhead like they were too close to my head. Too many people. Too much movement.

No way to get away from it.

My hands would shake.

Not from alcohol yet.

From people.

Too loud.

Too close.

Too unpredictable.

I'd walk through those halls with my shoulders tight, head down, shirt sticking to my back, feeling like every passing glance was something I had to survive. My chest stayed locked. My palms stayed wet.

Later, I'd call it anxiety.

Back then it was simpler.

Why does this feel wrong?

Why does nobody else seem bothered?

I didn't realize I was still living in the aftershock of everything before it.

Different building.

Same body.

Different noise.

Same alarm.

At thirteen, things around me shifted again. My parents remarried. For a while, the house felt quieter. Less like something was about to break.

It looked like stability.

But my body didn't fully believe it.

By fifteen, something changed. Not panic exactly. Something slower. Constant. Like heat under the skin that never turned off.

School became unbearable in a different way. Not just overwhelming. Trapping.

Every hallway felt like I was being funneled somewhere I didn't want to go. Every classroom felt too enclosed. Too many people watching without saying anything.

I stopped going.

I got my GED and told people it was for work, for money.

That wasn't the whole truth.

I couldn't stay in those rooms anymore.

I couldn't stand being watched.

So I walked.

I moved in with my uncle.

He was a Vietnam vet. Big presence. Purple Heart on the wall. Cold beer always around. Music always on. The house didn't ask questions. It just existed.

It felt easier there.

Not safe. Just familiar.

Alcohol was already part of that world before I understood it. Small sips from my uncle's cans when I was little. Nothing that meant anything yet.

But by sixteen, it wasn't small anymore.

It became a tool.

A cousin's trailer. Football on the TV. A room full of noise and people acting like nothing mattered.

Somebody handed me a beer.

So I drank it.

Then another.

Then whatever else was there.

Zimas.

Tequila.

Anything that went down fast enough to change how everything felt.

Two hours later, I was on a bathroom floor, tile cold against my face.

I remember thinking I was going to be sick forever.

"God, kill this," I said.

"I'll quit."

Lie.

Because something had already happened before the sickness hit.

For a little while, the shaking stopped.

The world loosened.

My body quit screaming.

That was the hook people miss.

It wasn't fun first.

It was relief.

And when your baseline is panic, relief feels holy.

By seventeen, drinking wasn't occasional anymore.

It had weight.

Wild Turkey. Vodka. Whatever was available. Nights blurred together. My body started pushing back—blood in the sink, pain that wouldn't stay quiet.

So I switched.

Beer instead.

Less pain.

Easier control.

Same purpose.

Keep the noise down.

Keep the body steady.

Keep myself from falling apart in real time.

Knowing it was breaking me didn't matter.

Something else always won that argument.

Then everything shifted again.

My cousin Nicholas was killed.

The official story called it suicide.

I didn't believe it.

It didn't fit who he was.

Johnson County had a way of swallowing stories like that and closing the book before anyone could ask questions. Three deaths in a short span around the same circle, and everything still got labeled and moved on from like nothing was wrong.

But nothing about it felt finished.

After Nicholas died, I collapsed.

Not sadness. Not confusion.

Collapse.

Full-body, everything-at-once collapse.

The kind where the future disappears and every minute feels like something you have to survive.

I ended up in the hospital for a month.

I quit smoking. Tried to get sober. Tried to make sense of it. Tried to build something out of all the chaos.

For a brief moment, I thought I'd go into law enforcement. Maybe understanding the system would make things make sense.

I interviewed at the jail. Shadowed a shift.

At the end, someone looked at me and said I just wanted to learn the system so I could help my "people" when they got locked up.

Not curiosity. Not effort.

Just category.

They didn't see a kid trying to make meaning out of a death that never made sense.

They saw a last name.

A family.

A category.

That moment stayed.

Because it told me something I hadn't fully understood yet.

Even when you try to step out of what you come from, people still decide what you are.
Fifteen years later, I looked into it myself.

What I found changed how I saw everything.

I don't believe it was suicide.

I believe it was murder.

Fat Albert. Curley. Dora.

Names that didn't fit the story I had carried for years, but eventually settled into place in a different way.

It was staged.

All of it.

That kind of truth doesn't bring peace.

It just confirms your body wasn't wrong to stay alert when everyone else told it to stop.

Around that time, my uncle started falling apart too.

He tried to take his life twice while I was still in the house.

The first time, pills scattered across the kitchen table.

The second time, it was a gun.

I called my mom and barely got the words out.

“I’m not right.”

That was the first real panic attack I can remember clearly.

Sweat.

Gasping.

No air.

Not fear in a moment.

Fear everywhere at once.

Then pain found another way in.

A migraine hit me so hard I couldn’t stand light. I was on the couch in the dark, asking for everything to be turned off.

My mom gave me a pill.

Hydrocodone.

Thirty minutes later I was moving again.

CHAPTER 3

Standing. Cleaning. Functional in a way I hadn’t been in a long time.

That was the moment something shifted.

Not high.

Quiet.

Functional.

Normal.

The next day, I took one before work.

Then it became part of how I got through anything that required me to keep going.

Hydrocodone. Tylenol 3s. Darvocets. Morphine. Benzos. Anything that lowered the volume.

Later, stronger things came into it.

I wasn't chasing a feeling.

I was trying to stay operational.

Inside, everything had started organizing itself around relief.

Around quiet.

Around whatever made the next hour bearable.

The fire didn't go away.

It found fuel.

And once it did, it didn't just burn.

It consumed.

PAIN TAKES ROOT

The discharge papers from 1999 said I was stable.

Stable.

That word looks clean on paper. Like something got solved. Like the storm agreed to step aside because someone checked a box.

I told myself I was done.

Clean slate.

Straight line.

New man.

That lasted a few weeks.

Then the migraines came back.

Blinding. Heavy. The kind that made light feel wrong and sound feel too close. I'd lie there in the dark with one hand over my eyes, waiting for the room to stop pressing in on me.

I knew where the pills were.

That was the problem.

Not because I had some big plan.

Not because I thought I was starting anything.

Because when pain showed up, relief had a location.

A bottle.

A cabinet.

A hand reaching before the thought finished forming.

I told myself it was temporary.

Just to get through work.

Just to get through the day.

Just this once.

That sentence was enough.

Not dramatic. Not sudden.

Just repeatable.

A shift at work. A long day. A pill in my hand. Then everything finally going quiet enough to function.

Not high.

Quiet.

That mattered more than anything else.

For someone who had never really known internal quiet, it didn't feel dangerous at first.

It felt useful.

It felt like being able to stand up inside my own skin without wanting to crawl out of it.

So I kept going.

Work. Responsibility. Days stacking on top of each other. I showed up. I did what I had to do.

From the outside, nothing broke.

That was the proof I used.

I was still working.

Still moving.

Still answering when someone called my name.

Still doing what needed done.

So it couldn't be that bad.

Inside, everything started organizing itself around that quiet.

Not escape.

Maintenance.

Something to keep me steady enough to stay in motion.

I learned how to stretch it.

How to time it.

How to make sure I had enough for work.

How to look fine when I wasn't.

How to keep moving when I wasn't fully there.

A pill before a shift.

One after a long day.

One tucked into the thought of tomorrow before tomorrow even came.

It stopped being a choice I thought about.

It became part of the routine.

Keys.

Wallet.

Work shirt.

Something to keep the noise down.

The days didn't announce what they were becoming. They just repeated until repetition started feeling normal.

That is how it took root.

Not in one fall.

In small agreements I made with myself and then forgot I had made.

I wasn't chasing a feeling.

I was trying not to fall apart in the middle of the day.

That distinction didn't matter then.

It only matters looking back.

Life around me kept moving anyway.

Work.

Pressure.

Expectations.

Small-town visibility where everybody already had a version of you before you spoke.

You could feel it in the grocery store. At gas pumps. In parking lots. People knowing your family, your history, your mistakes, or some version of them that had been passed around long enough to sound true.

So you contained it.

Not because it was gone.

Because there was nowhere for it to go.

I got good at looking functional.

That was easier than being okay.

I could clock in.

I could carry plates.

I could wash dishes.

I could answer questions.

I could laugh at the right time if I needed to.

But underneath it, everything had conditions.

How much sleep I got.

How much pain I was in.

Whether I had something to quiet the panic.

Whether I could get through the next few hours without my body turning against me.

The outside version of me kept moving.

The inside version kept negotiating.

Just get through this shift.

Just get through this day.

Just get home.

Just stay upright.

I wasn't looking for stability anymore.

I was looking for something that would hold me in place long enough to stop drifting.

Work became part of that.

Not healing.

Not peace.

Just structure.

A place to be.

Something to do with my hands.

A reason to keep moving when stillness got too loud.

The dish pit made sense in a way life didn't.

Plates came in dirty.

You washed them.

They went back out.

More came in.

You kept up or you didn't.

There wasn't much room for thinking.

Heat. Steam. Grease. Noise. Orders called out. People moving around each other in tight spaces without stopping.

I understood that kind of pressure.

It didn't ask me to explain myself.

It just asked me to keep going.

So I did.

And for a while, that looked enough like control that I believed it.

Then came the steakhouse.

CHAPTER 4

The dish pit.

The end of a shift.

A bet that sounded like nothing at the time.

Just words thrown into a loud room.

But it wasn't nothing.

It became the next structure I built my life around without realizing it.

I thought I was just moving forward.

I didn't see how quickly forward can become locked in.

By the time you notice it, you're already inside it.

And it's already holding shape.

LOCKED IN

The steakhouse job came first.

Dish pit. Heat. Steam. Grease in the air and plates stacking faster than they could clear.
It wasn't complicated work, but it didn't stop either.

That was the part I liked.

No thinking.

Just moving.

Plates came in dirty. I washed them. They went back out. More came in. The rhythm stayed simple enough to follow, even when everything else in me didn't. A girl worked there too.

Same shifts.

Same chaos.

Same end-of-night exhaustion where nobody had much left to pretend with.

We talked the way people talk when there's no room for anything else. Quick. Blunt. Half jokes over noise and clanging metal.

One night, it turned into a bet.

Something said without thinking it would become anything.

Just words thrown into a loud room at the end of a shift.

But it didn't leave.

After that, things started shifting in small ways.

Shifts traded.

Breaks lined up.

Conversations that should've ended didn't.

I didn't name it.

I didn't step back from it.

I just stayed in it.

Work didn't change. Dish pit. Orders. Heat. Same cycle every night.

But something else started building underneath it.

After shifts, I stopped leaving right away.

There was always something that kept me there a little longer. A conversation that didn't end clean. A reason to sit in the parking lot before driving home.

Engine off.

Lights cooling.

Time stretching.

At home, nothing was simple either.

Family.

Pressure.

Expectations that didn't stop just because I was tired.

So I moved between two worlds that didn't ask the same questions.

One loud enough to drown things out.

One quiet enough to feel heavy.

Drinking moved with both of them.

After shifts.

After nights that ran long.

After conversations I didn't know how to end.

It became part of how I transitioned between places. Not planned. Just automatic.

Work.

Home.

Repeat.

Days started losing edges.

Not chaos.

Just repetition without breaks between it.

I wasn't thinking about direction.

I wasn't stepping back to decide anything.

There wasn't distance for that anymore.

Just momentum.

And momentum, once it runs long enough, stops feeling like movement.

It starts feeling like structure.

I stayed in it.

Kept working.

Kept showing up.

Kept everything moving forward in the only way it would move.

Nothing announced a change.

Nothing warned me.

It just tightened.

Not all at once.

In pieces.

At first, it still looked like choice.

A shift traded without hesitation.

A ride given.

A night that ran longer than it should have.

A phone call I didn't ignore.

Then those things stopped feeling like decisions I made.

They started feeling like things I was already inside of.

Her name showed up in more of my days. Her problems landed in my time. Her presence followed me past the end of shifts, into the in-between spaces where I used to be alone.

I told myself I could still step out whenever I wanted.

I just never actually did.

Then the moment came that changed the shape of everything.

Pregnant.

No buildup.

No clean lead-in.

Just that word sitting in the middle of everything that had already started moving without permission.

And whatever this had been before that, it wasn't loose anymore.

CHAPTER 5

It had weight now.

It had consequence.

It had a future attached to it that didn't go away when the shift ended.

I didn't feel ready for it.

I didn't feel anchored in it.

But I didn't step away either.

I went to work the next day like I always did.

That's what I knew how to do.

Keep going.

Keep earning.

Keep things from falling apart in real time.

That was the moment it locked.

Not with a decision.

Not with clarity.

With responsibility that didn't undo itself when I stopped thinking about it.

And once it locked, there was no clean version of stepping out anymore.

THE WEIGHT

The days didn't change after that.

That was the strange part.

Everything still moved the same way it always had. Same shifts. Same steel sink. Same grease and steam hanging in the air. Same drive home with the radio low and the windows half down.

But nothing felt open anymore.

There was a line now that didn't exist before.

Not spoken.

Not agreed on.

Just there.

Work didn't care.

It kept moving.

Orders came in. Dishes stacked. Someone yelled across the kitchen without looking up from what they were doing.

So I stayed in it.

That's what I knew.

At the end of shifts, I'd count cash in my hand without thinking about it. Fold it, unfold it, put it back in my pocket like it needed to be checked twice before I believed it was real.

The uniform always smelled like grease and heat that never fully left my skin.

In the truck, the gas light stayed on longer than it should have more than once. I'd notice it, tell myself I'd deal with it after the next shift, then forget until it came on again. At home, things had their own shape now.

Not loud.

Not chaotic.

Just full.

Counter space with mail stacked in one corner. A bill folded and set down and not opened again. A clock ticking louder than it used to. Time feeling tighter in rooms that didn't change size.

I didn't sit down much when I got in.

If I did, I stayed there too long without meaning to.

Staring at nothing.

Listening to the house settle.

Then getting back up.

Because stillness wasn't useful.

There were mornings I left before anything else moved in the house. Nights I came back after everything was already dark. The middle of the day didn't feel like it belonged to me anymore.

It belonged to whatever had already been scheduled.

Appointments.

Work.

Calls.

Things written down somewhere and then written again so they wouldn't get missed.

Sometimes I'd see the same note twice in different places and realize I had already forgotten it once.

The drinking didn't change.

It just moved closer to everything else.

A beer left on the counter and finished without thinking. Another one in the car before going inside. A can crushed and left in a cup holder for too long.

Nothing dramatic.

Just present.

Sleep wasn't one stretch anymore.

It came in pieces.

Shorter than it should've been.

Waking up and not knowing how long I had actually been out.

Then getting up anyway.

The calendar kept filling.

The gas tank kept dropping.

The dishes kept stacking.

The next shift kept coming before the last one felt fully finished.

CHAPTER 6

There wasn't a version of starting over that made sense anymore.

There wasn't space for it.

There was just what was already in motion.

At some point, I stopped expecting it to feel different.

Not because it got easier.

Because it didn't change long enough to argue with anymore.

So I kept going.

One shift at a time.

One day at a time.

Not because it felt like progress.

Because it was the only thing still moving forward.

And I stayed inside that movement, whether I meant to or not.

THE FIRST YEARS

There wasn't really a separation anymore.

School, work, home.

It all blurred into one long loop.

Full-time school. Full-time job. Kids at home. Bills still coming. A house that didn't stop needing things just because I was tired.

Come home. Study for hours. Four if I could make it. Less if I couldn't.

A couple hours of sleep if I was lucky enough to get to it without something else needing done first.

Then up again.

Wake up.

Change the kids.

Feed them.

Get them settled.

Leave.

Work.

Come home.

Change them again.

Feed them again.

Clean what needed cleaned.

Fix what needed fixing.

Then school.

Then repeat.

It wasn't something I planned.

It just became the shape of the days.

At some point, I stopped measuring time in hours and started measuring it in what still needed done.

If I had a gap, I filled it.

If I didn't, I kept moving anyway.

Sleep stopped feeling like a reset.

It was just a pause between responsibilities.

Even that didn't feel guaranteed.

Sometimes I'd sit down and realize I wasn't sure how long I had been sitting.

Then I'd get up before it turned into something I had to explain to myself.

The kids never stopped needing something.

That part stayed constant.

Feed.

Change.

Hold.

Repeat.

Small hands.

Small voices.

Small demands that didn't wait for anything else in my life to settle first.

So nothing else really did.

School didn't care that I worked nights.

Work didn't care that I was studying after midnight.

Neither of them cared that I was barely sleeping.

Everything just assumed I would adjust.

So I did.

Not because it felt manageable.

Because there wasn't another option that didn't fall apart somewhere else.

Some nights, I'd sit down with schoolwork in front of me and realize I wasn't really reading it anymore.

Just looking at the page long enough to feel like I was still in it.

Then pushing through anyway.

Not because I was catching up.

Because stopping meant everything else would start showing at the same time.

There wasn't space for that.

So I kept splitting myself into pieces that could handle whatever was in front of them.

Work piece.

School piece.

Father piece.

Survival piece.

None of them fully rested at the same time.

But they kept going.

And from the outside, I'm not sure it looked like anything was wrong yet.

That was the part that made it easier to keep going.

Nothing had failed.

Not visibly.

Not all at once.

Maverick was still little.

Shayla came right behind him.

Two babies close together meant there was no clean pause between one need and the next.

One bottle finished and another thing started. One diaper changed and another load of laundry appeared. One child settled and the other needed picked up.

The house filled with small things.

Bottles on the counter.

Blankets over chairs.

Tiny socks that disappeared in laundry.

Formula smell.

Diapers.

Toys underfoot.

A car seat by the door.

Leaving the house wasn't just leaving anymore.

It was packing.

Checking.

Forgetting something.

Going back in.

Coming out again.

The world didn't slow down because there were babies in it.

Work still wanted me there.

School still wanted assignments.

Bills still wanted paid.

Cars still needed gas.

The sink still filled.

The next shift still came whether I had slept or not.

So I adjusted.

That's what I did.

If money was short, I worked more.

If something broke, I fixed it or figured out how to make it last.

If I was tired, I drank coffee and kept moving.

If I was overwhelmed, I didn't say much.

There wasn't time to fall apart in a useful way.

I didn't know how to be a father.

Not really.

I knew how to work.

I knew how to provide.

I knew how to keep lights on, tires rolling, food in the house, bills from swallowing everything whole.

So that became love in the only language I trusted.

Work.

Show up.

Bring money home.

Keep moving.

I held my kids and felt something I didn't know what to do with.

They were small.

Too small to understand anything about the storm they had been born into.

Too small to know the difference between a man who was steady and a man trying to act steady long enough to become one.

I'd look at them and feel my chest tighten.

Not because I didn't love them.

Because I did.

Because now there were people in the world who needed me to be more solid than I actually felt.

That kind of love didn't feel light.

It felt heavy.

Responsibility with a heartbeat.

So I stayed on my feet.

The days became a pattern.

Wake up.

Work.

Come home.

Help where I could.

Study.

Miss things I didn't mean to miss.

Sleep when sleep came.

Do it again.

There were good moments inside it.

I don't want to erase that.

Little hands around my fingers.

First sounds.

First steps.

Cartoons on low volume.

A kid asleep against my chest while the room stayed quiet around us.

Those moments mattered.

They still do.

But even the good moments carried pressure because I didn't trust anything good to stay untouched.

Nothing felt safe enough to simply enjoy without bracing.

Not even happiness.

Especially not happiness.

Because happiness felt like something life noticed.

And if life noticed it, life could take it.

The relationship kept moving too.

Not steady.

Moving.

There's a difference.

Steady means something holds.

Moving just means it hasn't stopped yet.

We broke apart and came back together in ways that started feeling normal because they happened enough times.

A fight.

Silence.

Distance.

Return.

A few good days.

Then the pressure building again.

I told myself every couple had problems.

That was easy to believe when I needed it to be true.

It let me stay focused on what I could measure.

Was there food?

Was there money?

Were the kids okay?

Did I make it to work?

Did I come home?

Those were questions I could answer.

The other questions were harder.

Was I okay?

Was this love?

Was I staying because I wanted to?

Was I staying because I didn't know how to leave without breaking everything?

I didn't ask those out loud.

I barely asked them inside.

There wasn't room for answers.

And if there had been, I'm not sure I would have trusted them.

So I kept working.

The pills stayed close.

Not always loud.

Not always obvious.

Just close.

Part of the machinery.

Something for pain.

Something for energy.

Something for quiet.

Something to get through the day without showing how much of me was held together with habit and pressure.

I didn't think of it as addiction every time.

Sometimes I thought of it as maintenance.

Sometimes I thought of it as medicine.

Sometimes I didn't think at all.

That was easier.

Take what kept me moving.

Do what had to be done.

Don't stare too long at the cost.

The cost always came later anyway.

In small ways first.

Being short when I didn't mean to.

Forgetting something I should have remembered.

Feeling my body tense before a conversation even started.

Getting quiet when I should have spoken.

Working longer because work made more sense than home.

At work, effort had a shape.

You did the thing.

You got paid.

You got tired.

You went back.

At home, effort didn't always land where I put it.

I could work all day and still walk into a room where something was wrong before I knew what it was.

Tone could change the air.

A look could change the night.

A sentence could turn the whole house sideways.

So I learned to read rooms the way I used to read footsteps.

Who was quiet.

Who was irritated.

What needed handled.

What needed avoided.

Where I could stand.

When to speak.

When not to.

I didn't know I was still doing the same old thing.

I just thought I was trying to keep peace.

There were times I wanted to leave.

Not the kids.

Never the kids.

The situation.

The pressure.

The feeling of being trapped inside a life I was also responsible for holding up.

But leaving had math attached to it.

Where would I go?

What would happen to the kids?

How would money work?

Would I become the father who disappeared?

Would they think I chose myself over them?

Those questions shut the door before I reached for the knob.

So I stayed.

And because I stayed, I worked harder.

Because working harder felt like proof.

Proof I cared.

Proof I was trying.

Proof I wasn't useless.

Proof I wasn't what people thought I was.

But proof is hungry.

It never stays full for long.

No matter how many shifts I worked, there was always another bill.

No matter how much I carried, there was always something else waiting.

No matter how tired I was, somebody still needed me to be functional.

So functional became the goal.

Not happy.

Not healed.

Not steady.

Functional.

If I could get up, go to work, study, bring something home, help with the kids, and not completely fall apart, I counted that as making it.

That became the bar.

And for a while, I cleared it.

Barely sometimes.

But I cleared it.

That was enough to keep me from admitting how low the bar had gotten.

The years didn't announce themselves as years.

They came as shifts.

Classes.

Bills.

Arguments.

Milestones.

Pictures.

Holidays.

Late nights.

Early mornings.

Small repairs.

Big worries.

A thousand ordinary things stacked so tightly together they started becoming a wall.

And behind that wall, the fire kept burning.

Not wild yet.

Not out in the open.

Just steady.

Fed by exhaustion.

Fed by silence.

Fed by pills.

Fed by the belief that if I could just keep moving, I could keep everything from catching. For a while, it almost looked like that was working.

That was the dangerous part.

Because when something almost works, you keep trusting it longer than you should.

And I trusted it.

Work harder.

Stay quiet.

Numb what you have to.

Love the kids.

Don't break the house.

Keep going.

That became the system.

Not all at once.

Not with a name.

Just one day after another until the life I was building and the life I was surviving became the same thing.

CHAPTER 7

WHEN IT STOPPED HOLDING

The system didn't break all at once.

That would have been easier to recognize. Easier to explain later. Easier to point at and say:

this is where it went wrong.

It didn't do that.

It kept running.

Same days. Same structure. Same load.

Work. School. Kids. Home.

Nothing changed on paper.

But something stopped holding underneath it.

It started small. Almost invisible.

I'd be in the middle of a task and lose the thread of it without noticing. Stand there for a second trying to remember what I was doing, like the thought had just stepped out of the room and didn't come back when I called it.

Schoolwork became the first place it showed up clearly.

I'd sit down after everything else was done and read the same paragraph over and over. The words were there. I could see them. But they weren't sticking.

I'd get to the end of a page and realize I hadn't taken anything in. Not confusion exactly. More like distance. Like I was looking at the material instead of inside it.

So I'd start over.

That became the pattern.

Start. Lose it. Restart.

Again. And again.

At first I told myself it was fatigue. That made sense. There was always a reason to be tired.

But it didn't improve with rest because there wasn't real rest anymore. Only gaps between responsibilities long enough to reset the body just enough to keep going.

Not recovery. Maintenance.

The same thing started happening in daily movement.

I'd leave the house and check my pockets. Wallet. Keys. Phone.

Walk ten steps. Check again.

Not because I thought they were gone. But because I couldn't trust the feeling that I still had them.

The certainty wasn't there anymore, so I kept verifying it.

It started to take longer to do simple things. Not because they were harder, but because I couldn't move through them in a straight line.

Every step needed rechecking. Every action needed confirmation.

Like my brain had started buffering in the middle of things it used to run automatically. At home, it showed up differently.

Short fuse moments I didn't used to have.

Not explosions. Just sharp edges.

A tone that came out harder than I meant. A response that landed heavier than the situation needed.

Then the pause afterward where I'd register it and adjust. Not proud. Not intentional. Just noticing it after the fact and trying to correct course without drawing attention to it.

But correction takes energy too. And I was already running low on that.

So the corrections started lagging behind the reactions.

The gap between what I meant and what came out started widening.

Work was still the only place that felt like it had rails.

There was a beginning. A task. A finish. A result.

Even when I was exhausted, the structure held. You showed up. You did the work. You left.

It didn't require interpretation. It didn't ask how I felt about it.

So I leaned into that harder.

Not consciously at first. Just naturally.

The more unstable everything else felt, the more I stayed where things made sense.

Work started taking more of me than it used to. Not because I wanted to escape home exactly, but because it was the only environment where my brain still knew how to function without constantly recalibrating.

At home, recalibration never stopped.

Every room had information in it. Tone. Silence. Timing. Mood shifts I had to read before I spoke.

I started entering rooms already scanning instead of just walking in.

Who was quiet. Who wasn't. What had changed since I last saw them.

Not because I wanted to. Because missing it meant stepping wrong.

And stepping wrong had consequences that weren't always immediate but always real.

So I watched first. Spoke second. If at all.

The kids were still the center of everything. That part didn't change.

Feed them. Change them. Hold them. Repeat.

But even that started feeling slightly off rhythm.

Not in what needed to be done. In how it landed in me.

I was there. I was present. But it took longer to fully arrive in the moment. Like I was catching up to myself while still moving.

They would say something, and I'd hear it, but there was a delay between hearing and responding that hadn't been there before.

A fraction of distance that didn't belong.

Sleep didn't fix it.

If anything, sleep just created a sharper contrast.

Because the body would rest, but the mind would wake up in the same place it left.

Nothing reset. It just paused.

And every time I started again, I was starting slightly further behind than the day before.

I didn't have language for any of it then.

I just knew I was still functioning, but it wasn't clean anymore.

It took more effort to do less.

More attention to stay consistent. More correction to look normal.

The same life was still happening.

But it wasn't holding together the same way.

There were moments I could feel it clearly.

Not dramatic moments. Small ones.

Standing in the middle of a room, realizing I couldn't tell if I had already done the thing
I was about to do.

Or starting a task and stopping halfway through because I wasn't fully sure I had started it correctly.

That kind of hesitation started creeping into everything.

Not loud. Just constant enough to notice if I paid attention.

So I stopped paying attention.

That was the adjustment.

Keep moving. Don't look too closely at the seams.

From the outside, nothing had fallen apart yet.

That's what made it harder to explain even to myself.

Because collapse has a shape people recognize.

This didn't look like that.

It looked like the same person doing the same things.

Just with more effort behind it.

I kept telling myself I was still ahead of it.

Still managing. Still holding it together.

And in a technical sense, I was.

But “holding together” had started to mean something smaller than it used to.

It no longer meant stable.

It meant not fully breaking in front of anyone.

The gap between those two things was growing.

CHAPTER 8

And I didn’t have a word for what lived inside that gap yet.

Only the sense that something was starting to cost more than it used to.

And I was still paying it the same way.

THE BREAKING POINT

Let me take you back to 2011.

The external storm of my childhood had passed, but the internal fire still burned—fueled by years of untreated pain and escalating substance use.

My life looked stable from the outside.

Kids.

A house.

A structure.

Inside, it was propped up by avoidance and fragile compromises.

Thursday, June 23, 2011.

I was in the bathroom at my parents’ house, trying to take a shit.

Someone started pounding on the door.

“Open up!” Garrett yelled.

“I’m taking a shit!” I snapped back, annoyed.

The pounding got louder.

“Open the door, man—you’ll be happy! I’ve got a surprise for you.” I opened it, still half-seated on the toilet.

Garrett stood there, eyes intense, something frantic flickering behind them.

Before I could react, he grabbed my arm, found a good vein, and slid a needle in.

Just as fast, he pulled it out.

“See?” he said.

Then he walked out of the bathroom.

Out of the house.

That was Thursday.

I never saw him alive again.

Garrett.

William Garrett Lingar.

Thirty-two.

Wild.

Always looking over his shoulder.

Warrants.

Chaos.

Late nights.

A mirror I didn’t want to look into.

I envied his freedom back then. No wife. No kids. No house tying him down. He envied the structure I had.

Kids.

A house.

A life that at least looked contained.

We used to drink beer and talk about that sometimes, both of us staring at the other man's life like it held something ours didn't.

Looking back now, at forty-three, I see it different.

At nineteen or twenty, I thought I was trapped.

Now I know I had more than I understood.

It was stressful.

It was heavy.

I stayed zombified half the time just trying to carry it.

But I had a life.

A family.

A chance.

And I didn't know how to live inside it yet.

The next morning was Friday, June 24, 2011.

Arkansas summer heat pressed thick against everything.

Greg's mom picked me up in Clarksville.

We were heading to Fayetteville to meet Greg, then on to Kansas City to help his girlfriend Beth move.

A three-story house.

Just Greg and me.

Heavy work.

The kind of work I understood.

The previous week, Garrett had mentioned to Greg that he would go help him in Kansas City.

But Friday morning, I didn't wake him when we left.

I didn't go back to his room.

I didn't make a decision.

That's the part that eats at you.

It wasn't a big choice.

It wasn't some dramatic betrayal.

It was a nothing choice.

A non-decision.

One I would replay for the rest of my life.

Halfway up the highway, my phone rang.

Garrett's voice was pure rage.

"What the fuck, dude? Greg's a cop—I would've ridden with him! You knew I wanted to go!"

Before I could answer, the line went dead.

That was the last time I heard his voice.

Angry.

Hurt.

Alive.

Later, the pieces came together.

He took my dad's Xterra and drove to his girlfriend's place looking for his meds.

She said she didn't have them.

He called the cops.

Panic escalated.

Then she called them back and accused him of rape.

They questioned him for hours.

Let him go.

By then, he was unraveling.

That night, he bought cheap beer.

Drank.

Drove.

Around 10 p.m., on Brick Plant Road, he lost control.

Ninety miles an hour into a tree.

The impact threw the headlights fifty yards from the wreck.

Garrett died instantly.

Saturday morning in Kansas City felt normal until it didn't.

That's how death moves.

The world keeps acting like itself right before it stops being the same world.

I was leaning against the U-Haul in Beth's driveway when Greg came out, face tight.

He handed me his phone.

It was Trinity.

"Garrett's gone," she sobbed. "He's dead. There was a wreck."

The world stopped.

I stumbled away, through the screen door, out onto the lawn.

Collapsed.

Punched the ground until my arms screamed.

I needed something solid to hit because nothing inside me had shape anymore.

I looked up at the sky and screamed:

“Fuck you, God. Fuck you.”

The guilt hit immediately.

If I'd woken him up.

If I hadn't left.

If I had gone back to his room.

If I had answered better.

If I had done one tiny thing different.

Maybe he'd still be alive.

That is what guilt does after trauma.

It turns grief into math.

It creates equations with no answers.

It makes you believe you can solve death backward.

It tells you if you can find the right mistake, maybe you can make the loss make sense.

But all it really does is hand you a knife and teach you to keep turning it.

Garrett's death didn't feel like grief at first.

It felt like proof.

Proof that I was dangerous to the people I loved.

Proof that being close to me led to wreckage.

Proof that I should have known.

Proof that somehow, even when I did nothing, I still caused harm.

That kind of guilt doesn't just hurt.

It attaches itself to identity.

Beth's mother watched quietly from the porch swing.

When I looked up, she opened her arms.

No speech.

No explanation.

No trying to fix it.

Just arms.

I collapsed into her, sobbing, snot and tears soaking her shirt.

She didn't say a word.

She just held me.

I didn't know it then, but that was co-regulation before I had the language.

A steady nervous system meeting a shattered one.

No advice.

No shame.

Just presence.

That night, we went to a Royals-Cubs game.

I thought distraction might help.

Forty thousand fans roared around me.

Hot dogs.

Noise.

Movement.

Life continuing like mine hadn't just been ripped open.

I felt nothing.

The only thing my brain could lock onto was the green of the grass.

Unnaturally vivid.

Impossibly calm.

Like my mind had picked one safe color and clung to it while everything else blurred.

A couple days later, back in Arkansas, grief finally crushed me.

Lying beside Trinity, the sobs came hard and uncontrollable.

Not pretty crying.

Not quiet tears.

A body breaking open.

Shaking the mattress.

Garrett was gone.

My brother was gone.

That final phone call was permanent.

The non-decision was permanent.

The guilt felt permanent.

Then Trinity said: "Shut up. I have work tomorrow."

Something inside me broke that night.

Not because she caused Garrett's death.

Not because one sentence created all the damage.

But because in my deepest pain, I reached for comfort and found a wall.

Worse than a wall.

A dismissal.

My grief was inconvenient.

My sobbing was annoying.

My pain needed to keep the volume down because somebody had work.

That does something to a man.

Especially a man already wired to believe his needs are dangerous.

Especially a man already trained to stay quiet.

Especially a man who learned under a blanket that sound can bring danger.

So I swallowed it.

Not all at once.

But enough.

I learned another lesson.

Don't bring grief here.

Don't bring pain here.

Don't need too loudly.

Don't fall apart where people can hear you.

At the time, I thought Garrett's death—and her response—was the lowest point of my life.

I didn't understand yet that it wasn't an ending.

It was a crack.

The flood was still coming.

And when it came, it would carry everything with it.

The grief.

The addiction.

The shame.

The marriage.

The kids.

The court dates.

The body that froze.

The man who kept trying to survive with tools that kept killing him.

Garrett's death did not create the fire.

But it poured gasoline on it.

And after that, even the quiet days smelled like smoke.

CHAPTER 9

THE MATH OF SURVIVAL

For a long time, I thought I was defective, like I was missing whatever allowed other people to sit still without wanting to crawl out of their own skin. I looked at the drinking, the pills, the meth, the way I couldn't stop moving, and the way silence never felt peaceful, and I called all of it weakness. I called it addiction, laziness, selfishness, brokenness, and every other name I could find except the one that actually explained it.

Trauma.

I didn't know I was doing exactly what my body had been trained to do. I was surviving, but survival doesn't always look heroic from the outside. Sometimes it looks like lying, avoiding, using, working until your body gives out, sleeping in a chair because a bed feels too exposed, or falling apart in private and still showing up the next day like nothing happened. Sometimes survival looks ugly. Sometimes it hurts people. Sometimes it destroys the very things you are trying to keep.

I didn't understand that back then. I didn't have language for it. I just had the fire.

Later, when everything finally started coming apart, someone handed me numbers. Tests, scores, categories. A way to measure what had been happening inside me my whole life. They weren't a cure, and they weren't an excuse, but they gave me something I had never had before: a map.

Three numbers. 6. 60. 20.

That was the math. Not the whole story, but enough to show the shape of it.

The Foundation

ACE Score: 6

The ACE score measures what happens before you are eighteen: abuse, neglect, violence, instability, and the kinds of experiences a child is supposed to survive and somehow grow out of, as if the body simply forgets what it had to become. A six means the foundation cracked early, before anything had a chance to settle.

Mine did.

My parents divorced when I was five, and after that the house never stayed one thing for very long. There were different men, different rules, and different versions of home, but the same tension running underneath all of it. My mom did what she could, and that matters. We had food, clothes, and shoes. I was not hungry. I was not neglected in the basic sense. But provision is not the same as safety.

A full plate doesn't quiet the sound of violence in another room. Clean clothes don't teach a child that home is safe. Shoes on your feet don't stop your nervous system from learning how to disappear. When voices started rising, I learned exactly what to do. I got small. I got quiet. I stayed out of the way. I learned not to need anything and not to draw attention, because attention meant risk.

There are things a child should never become good at, but I became good at reading rooms. I became good at packing. I became good at leaving. By eleven years old, I could load a U-Haul better than I could play Tetris. That sounds like a throwaway line, but it isn't. A child is not supposed to know how to organize an entire life into a truck. I knew what went first, what could break, and what had to be carried carefully, because everything already felt temporary.

That became normal. Nothing holds. No place stays. No one protects you for long.

Then there were the things that should not have happened at all. I was seventeen years old when I was arrested with my friend. He was fourteen. We were both minors. The police said they were looking for drugs, and they made us bend over and spread while they shined flashlights where no flashlight should have gone. We did what we were told because they had badges, guns, and authority, and we didn't know enough yet to understand what was happening to us.

At the time, we didn't have the language for it. We didn't call it what it was. We just knew we couldn't stop it.

Years later, looking back with adult eyes, I understood it differently. We were children. They were not. They crossed a line that should never be crossed, and they used their power to humiliate us in a way that left confusion behind long after the moment ended. That kind of experience doesn't just become memory. It becomes wiring.

No one is safe.

That was the lesson.

The Climate

PCL-5 Score: 60

The PTSD checklist starts at thirty-one. I scored sixty. That is not stress, and it is not overreaction. It is a nervous system that never powers down.

It explains why I don't sleep in a bed. A bed means flat on your back, eyes closed, no control, no awareness. To most people that is rest. To me it feels like exposure. So I sleep in a chair, half upright, still alert, still positioned like something might happen.

Even when nothing is happening. Even when I am alone. Even when I know I am safe.

Knowing something and feeling it are not the same thing. That gap is what trauma lives in.

I scan every room I walk into without thinking about it. I notice who is quiet, who is irritated, what changed in the air before anyone speaks. I don't decide to do it. My body does it automatically, long before my mind catches up.

That is why conflict never felt like just conflict. A raised voice felt like danger. Silence felt like warning. Distance felt like rejection. Everything carried weight it probably didn't deserve, but my body didn't care what was reasonable. It only cared about patterns.

So I adapted. I fixed things. I avoided things. I worked. I used. I moved. I disappeared into whatever kept the system stable enough to function.

The pills fit into that. So did the alcohol. So did the meth later.

People hear addiction and think escape, and sometimes it is, but for me it was also control. It lowered the volume. It slowed the internal alarm long enough for me to get through a shift, a day, a conversation, or a moment without breaking apart. It was not about pleasure. It was about surviving my own nervous system.

That doesn't make it safe. It doesn't erase what it cost. But it explains why it made sense at the time.

When your body is always on fire, anything that cools it down can start to look like medicine, even when it is destroying you.

The Weight

PHQ-9 Score: 20 Twenty is labeled severe depression, but the word depression doesn't really hold what that actually is. It sounds too soft, too distant, too simple. What it looked like for me was collapse hidden under motion.

It was waking up already exhausted. It was sleeping and not recovering. It was sitting in front of a page and reading the same paragraph over and over without anything landing. It was walking into a room and forgetting why I went there. It was staring at simple tasks and feeling my mind buffer like it couldn't load the next step.

It was also shame. Constant shame. Shame for using, shame for not stopping, shame for being overwhelmed, shame for not being who I thought I should be, and shame for still hurting over things other people expected me to be over.

Then there was Garrett.

His death became a fault line. Everything split into before and after. I kept trying to replay it, not because it helped, but because my mind refused to accept that there was no way to undo it. I kept running the math backward, looking for the one moment that could change the outcome.

If this. If that. If I had. If I didn't.

But there was no equation that brought him back.

And the mind kept calculating anyway.

That is what grief like that becomes. Not just sadness, but a machine that won't shut off.

And then came the night I was breaking open and reached for comfort, and heard instead, "Shut up. I have work tomorrow."

That moment didn't just hurt. It taught something. It taught that pain has limits. That need has a volume cap. That if you are too loud in your worst moment, you become a problem instead of a person.

After that, something changes. You learn to take your pain somewhere else. You learn to make it smaller. You learn to survive it quietly. And over time, you start to believe that your pain doesn't belong anywhere at all.

The Blueprint

Those numbers don't excuse anything. They don't erase damage or remove responsibility. My survival strategies still affected real people in real ways, and I have to live with that fully.

But they also explain something I spent most of my life misunderstanding. I was not broken in isolation. I was conditioned. I was shaped by repeated experiences that trained my nervous system to treat the world as unstable and unsafe.

And that kind of wiring doesn't stop just because life looks normal on the surface. You can function and still be drowning. You can work and still be collapsing inside. You can keep showing up and still be living in a body that never stopped bracing for impact.

For most of my life, I thought I was fighting myself. Now I understand something different. I was not fighting myself. I was running survival software in a system that never got to stand down.

That is the math.

CHAPTER 10

It kept me alive.

But it was never going to make me free.

THE MATH OF SURVIVAL

For a long time, I thought I was defective, like I was missing whatever allowed other people to sit still without wanting to crawl out of their own skin. I looked at the drinking, the pills, the meth, the way I couldn't stop moving, the way silence never felt peaceful, and I called all of it weakness. I called it addiction, laziness, selfishness, brokenness, and every other name I could find except the one that actually explained it.

Trauma.

I didn't know I was doing exactly what my body had been trained to do. I was surviving, but survival does not always look heroic from the outside. Sometimes it looks like lying, avoiding, using, working until your body gives out, sleeping in a chair because a bed feels too exposed, or falling apart in private and still showing up the next day like nothing happened. Sometimes survival looks ugly. Sometimes it hurts people. Sometimes it destroys the very things you are trying to keep.

I didn't understand that back then. I didn't have language for it. I just had the fire.

Later, when everything finally started coming apart, someone handed me numbers. Tests, scores, categories. A way to measure what had been happening inside me my whole life. They were not a cure, and they were not an excuse, but they gave me something I had never had before: a map.

Three numbers: 6, 60, and 20.

That was the math. Not the whole story, but enough to show the shape of it.

The Foundation: ACE Score 6

The ACE score measures what happens before you are eighteen: abuse, neglect, violence, instability, and the kinds of experiences a child is supposed to survive and somehow grow out of, as if the body simply forgets what it had to become. A six means the foundation cracked early, before anything had a chance to settle.

Mine did.

My parents divorced when I was five, and after that the house never stayed one thing for very long. There were different men, different rules, and different versions of home, but the same tension kept running underneath all of it. My mom did what she could, and that matters. We had food, clothes, and shoes. I was not hungry. I was not neglected in the basic sense. But provision is not the same thing as safety.

A full plate does not quiet the sound of violence in another room. Clean clothes do not teach a child that home is safe. Shoes on your feet do not stop your nervous system from learning how to disappear. When voices started rising, I learned exactly what to do. I got small, got quiet, stayed out of the way, needed nothing, and drew no attention because attention meant risk.

There are things a child should never become good at, but I became good at reading rooms. I became good at packing. I became good at leaving. By eleven years old, I could load a U- Haul better than I could play Tetris. That sounds like a throwaway line, but it is not. A child is not supposed to know how to organize an entire life into a truck. I knew what went first, what could break, and what had to be carried carefully because everything already felt temporary.

That became normal to me. Nothing holds. No place stays. No one protects you for long.

By fourteen, I already felt older than I was. Not wise, and not mature in some clean, impressive way. Old. I had a full-time job. I didn't like being around people my age because they felt too loud, too careless, too untouched by consequence. I thought they were immature. Maybe some of them were, but maybe some of it was me not knowing how to be young around people who still could be.

My body felt like an old man's body long before anybody gave me a medical reason for it. Heavy, tired, tense, like everything inside me had been bracing for years and nobody had told it the war was over. In my late thirties, a doctor told me my testosterone was at the level of an eighty-six-year-old man. I remember hearing that and feeling something strange. Not surprise exactly. Recognition. Because that was how my body had always felt. Like it had aged ahead of me. Like the calendar said one thing and my bones said another.

I didn't know then how much a body can carry before it ever gets called sick. I just knew I was fourteen and already tired in a way I couldn't explain.

Then there were the things that should not have happened at all. I was seventeen years old when I was arrested with my friend. He was fourteen. We were both minors. The police said they were looking for drugs, and they made us bend over and spread while they shined flashlights where no flashlight should have gone. We did what we were told because they had badges, guns, and authority, and we didn't know enough yet to understand what was happening

to us.

At the time, we didn't have the language for it. We didn't call it what it was. We just knew we couldn't stop it. Years later, looking back with adult eyes, I understood it differently. We were children. They were not. They crossed a line that should never be crossed, and they used their power to humiliate us in a way that left confusion behind long after the moment ended.

That kind of experience does not just become memory. It becomes wiring.

No one is safe. That was the lesson.

The Climate: PCL-5 Score 60

The PTSD checklist starts at thirty-one. I scored sixty. That is not stress, and it is not overreaction. That is a nervous system that never powers down.

It explains why I don't sleep in a bed. Not really. I sleep in a computer chair. Before that, couches and recliners. Anywhere that let me stay half-ready and half-upright, like part of me still needed to be available if something happened. I don't plan sleep. I know I slept when I wake up.

That sounds strange if your body understands rest as safety. Mine never did. A bed felt too final unless someone safe was in it with me. Alone, it felt exposed. Too open, too still, too much like surrender. So I slept in places where sleep could happen by accident. A chair, a couch, a recliner. Places where I could pass out without admitting I was trying to rest.

I didn't know for years that this was a trauma response. I just thought it was how I was.

A bed means flat on your back, eyes closed, no control, no awareness. To most people, that is rest. To me, it felt like exposure. Even when nothing was happening. Even when I was alone.

Even when I knew I was safe. Knowing something and feeling it are not the same thing. That gap is where trauma lives.

I scan every room I walk into without thinking about it. I notice who is quiet, who is irritated, and what changed in the air before anyone speaks. I don't decide to do it. My body does it automatically, long before my mind catches up. That is why conflict never felt like just conflict. A raised voice felt like danger. Silence felt like warning. Distance felt like rejection. Everything carried weight it probably didn't deserve, but my body didn't care what was reasonable. It cared about patterns.

So I adapted. I fixed things, avoided things, worked, used, moved, and disappeared into whatever kept the system stable enough to function.

The substances fit into that, but the timeline matters.

My addiction was not one straight line. It was substitution. One form of relief replacing another while the same fire kept burning underneath. There was almost always something in the system. If it was not pills, it was beer. If it was not beer, it was weed. If it was not weed, it was meth. The substance changed, but the need underneath it stayed the same: quiet the alarm, change the state, get through the day.

I drank and smoked weed in my younger years. I had pain pills from about seventeen to twenty.

In 2003, I quit smoking weed because I wanted to be a cop. I did not smoke weed again until 2005 at a Hank Jr. concert. Around that period, drinking changed too, stopping for stretches, shifting around whatever else was happening in my life.

Pain pills came back around age twenty-three and became the main thing for years, until around thirty-two. Then Suboxone came in for about six months. Around 2015 and 2016, meth entered the picture, and when meth came, the drinking and pills stopped completely for a while. Meth did not stack on top of those things for me at that point. It replaced them.

From 2016 to 2020, alcohol became the main pattern again. During that period, I smoked more weed too, mostly connected to drinking. Then after 2020, meth came back and became the main pattern again.

That matters because people like simple stories.

They like to say, "He was on drugs," like that explains every year, every failure, every fear, every absence, every collapse, and every part of the damage. But addiction was not the whole story.

Some years I was using. Some years I was not using the same way. Some years it was alcohol.

Some years it was pills. Some years it was weed. Some years it was meth. Some years the chemical changed, but the nervous system fire stayed the same. The mistake people make is thinking if there were no drugs in a season, then I must have been okay.

I was not okay.

Sometimes I was surviving without that particular escape.

During the college years, I was not on meth, and I was not in the later kind of addiction people may imagine when they hear my story. I was exhausted, working full time, going to school full time, raising kids, studying late, sleeping maybe two hours a night, and trying to act like that was normal. There was no meth carrying me through that part of my life. There was no version of the later collapse holding it together. It was stress, poverty, fatherhood, school, work, alcohol or old coping patterns around the edges at different points, and a nervous system that did not know how to stand down.

Not every collapse in my life can be blamed on drugs.

Some of it was what happens when a wounded body is asked to carry too much for too long.

People hear addiction and think escape, and sometimes it is. But for me, it was also control. It lowered the volume. It slowed the internal alarm long enough for me to get through a shift, a day, a conversation, or a moment without breaking apart. It was not always about pleasure. A lot of the time, it was about surviving my own nervous system.

That does not make it safe. It does not erase what it cost. But it explains why it made sense at the time. When your body is always on fire, anything that cools it down can start to look like medicine, even when it is destroying you.

The Pain They Didn't Believe

The pills did not enter my life as a party.

They entered through pain.

My upper back would hurt so bad while I worked that it could bring tears to my eyes. It was worse when I had to stand in one place too long. Dishes. Cooking. Butchering. The butcher job was the worst. There were times I would be doubled over from it, trying to finish the job while my body felt like it was splitting between my shoulders.

I tried to fix it the normal ways first.

Rubber mats. Insoles. Different shoes. Sketchers instead of boots. A hundred dollars on shoes.

Fifty dollars on insoles. Ibuprofen. Anything I could think of that might take pressure off my back and let me keep working.

Nothing touched it enough.

I started dealing with that pain around twenty. I was young, and because I was young, doctors did not seem to know where to put me. Back pain, to them, seemed like something older people had. When younger people complained about back pain, they expected lower back pain. Mine was upper back. Between my shoulder blades. Somewhere around T5 or T6 if I remember right.

So instead of being treated like a young man in real pain, I often felt like I was being treated like someone looking for pills.

That does something to you.

It makes you doubt your own body. It makes you feel guilty for hurting. It makes every appointment feel like a courtroom where you have to prove you are not lying before anyone will even listen.

Eventually, an out-of-town doctor took more time with me. He said it was strange that I was so young with back pain, and even stranger that it was upper back instead of lower. He ran his knuckles up my spine and found the spot. I think it was between five and six. He listened in a way other doctors had not.

I do not think the MRI showed anything clear, but the pain was real whether the picture explained it or not.

He gave me Tylenol 3 or Tylenol 4. I do not remember which. It gave me headaches. I asked about Darvocet because it helped the pain without giving me the same headaches. Looking back, I know how that probably sounded from an addiction point of view. I know a doctor could hear a specific request and think, there it is. But I also remember the look on his face shifting, like maybe the request was so specific and practical that he believed me more, not less.

Darvocet helped.

For the first time, something touched the pain enough that I could work.

That is where the truth gets complicated.

Because yes, I had real pain. Yes, I was dismissed. Yes, I tried shoes, mats, insoles, ibuprofen, and everything I could before medication became the thing that worked. Yes, I had a prescription for about three years of it. And yes, the relief still became dangerous.

A prescription explained how it started.

It did not protect me from where it went.

My nervous system did not care whether the bottle had my name on it. My body only knew that pain got quieter, the alarm dropped, and I could stand there long enough to finish a shift. When your life is built around work, and work is the only proof you feel you have, anything that lets you keep working starts to feel less like a drug and more like survival.

That was the trap.

It was not just chasing a high. It was trying to stay upright. It was trying to keep a job. It was trying to get through dishes, cooking, cutting meat, standing in one place, and not falling apart in front of people who already might not believe you.

Then the line blurred.

Treatment became maintenance. Maintenance became need. Need became dependence.

Dependence became part of the larger machine.

And by the time Darvocet was taken off the market, the route had already been carved into me.

That is why I do not tell this part as an excuse.

I tell it because the truth matters.

The pain was real. The dismissal was real. The prescription was real. The dependence was real. All of it was real at the same time.

Poverty Weaponized My Nervous System

For a long time, I thought trauma was only what happened inside me. The fear. The scanning.

The panic. The addiction. The way my body never seemed to shut off. But that was only half the truth.

The other half was the life around me that kept requiring that same damaged system to perform.

A nervous system can be wounded early, but poverty teaches it there is no room to fall apart.

Bills do not wait because your body is dysregulated. Kids do not stop needing food because you are exhausted. Work does not care that you slept two hours. Rent does not care that you are grieving. A shift does not become optional because your chest feels like it is full of fire.

That was the trap. My body was already wired for survival, and then life kept putting me in situations where survival mode was the only thing that got anything done.

When I was working full time, going to school full time, raising kids, sleeping a couple hours a night, and trying to keep everything from collapsing, I did not have the luxury of asking whether I was okay. Okay was not the requirement. Functional was.

Could I get to work? Could I bring money home? Could I keep the lights on? Could I buy diapers? Could I put gas in the vehicle? Could I keep going long enough for the next thing that needed me?

That was the math.

It was not emotional math. It was survival math. If I missed a shift, money got shorter. If money got shorter, something else broke loose. If something broke loose, the whole house felt like it could come apart. So my body learned that stopping was dangerous, even when stopping was what I needed.

That is how poverty weaponizes trauma.

It takes a nervous system that already believes rest is unsafe and gives it proof. It takes a body that already feels responsible for every shift in the room and adds bills, kids, work schedules, gas tanks, court dates, rent, groceries, and late fees. It takes someone who already does not know how to ask for help and puts him in a life where asking feels useless anyway.

People like to talk about choice like it happens in a clean room, but choice does not feel the same when every option has a consequence attached to someone you love. Leaving was not just leaving. It was rent. It was custody. It was where the kids would sleep. It was whether I was becoming the father who disappeared. It was whether choosing peace for myself meant breaking something behind me.

Rest was not just rest. It was time I was not working, studying, fixing, earning, cleaning, or catching up. Saying no was not just saying no. It felt like risking a job, a relationship, a roof, a reputation, or someone's anger.

That is why the word "functional" became dangerous in my life. Functional did not mean healthy.

Functional meant useful enough that nobody had to stop and look at what it was costing me.

I could be drowning and still clock in. I could be falling apart and still wash dishes. I could be exhausted and still carry kids, bills, groceries, shame, grief, and another shift on top of everything else. From the outside, that looked like responsibility. Sometimes it was. But sometimes it was fear wearing responsibility's clothes.

The world praised the parts of me that were killing me. Working too much looked like dedication.

Never saying no looked like being dependable. Carrying more than I could handle looked like strength. Not needing anything looked like maturity. Staying quiet looked like discipline. Nobody asks what makes a person able to keep going like that. They just use it until it breaks.

That is why addiction made sense inside that life, even while it was destroying me. I was not only trying to escape memories. I was trying to meet impossible demands with a body that had no off switch. Pills, alcohol, weed, and later meth did not enter a peaceful life and ruin it. They entered a life already built on exhaustion, panic, responsibility, shame, pain, poverty, and no room to collapse.

I was not always chasing a high. I was chasing enough quiet to keep producing.
Enough

numbness to keep showing up. Enough energy to get through the next shift. Enough distance from my own body to survive living inside it.

That does not make it right. It does not make it safe. It does not erase the damage. But it does explain why it had such a hold on me.

A wounded nervous system needs safety to heal. Mine got pressure. Mine got work. Mine got bills. Mine got kids who needed me. Mine got a world that called me useful when I was overfunctioning and unreliable when the bill finally came due.

That is the part people miss when they talk about trauma like it is only personal. Trauma happened inside my body, but it was not kept alive by my body alone. It was kept alive by every system around me that demanded output while offering no room to recover.

The incubator taught my body distance. The blanket taught my body stillness. Poverty taught my body there was never enough. Work taught my body that rest had to be earned. Fatherhood taught my body that falling apart could hurt people I loved. Addiction taught my body that quiet could be bought for a little while, even if the price kept getting higher.

All of it became one machine, and for years, I thought that machine was me.

It wasn't.

It was the architecture of survival. A damaged nervous system inside a life that kept demanding more than it could safely give.

The wound was biological.

The cage was structural.

And I lived inside both.

The Weight: PHQ-9 Score 20

Twenty is labeled severe depression, but the word depression does not really hold what that actually is. It sounds too soft, too distant, too simple. What it looked like for me was collapse hidden under motion.

It was waking up already exhausted. It was sleeping and not recovering. It was sitting in front of a page and reading the same paragraph over and over without anything landing. It was walking into a room and forgetting why I went there. It was staring at simple tasks and feeling my mind buffer like it couldn't load the next step.

It was also shame. Constant shame. Shame for using, shame for not stopping, shame for being overwhelmed, shame for not being who I thought I should be, and shame for still hurting over things other people expected me to be over.

Then there was Garrett.

His death became a fault line. Everything split into before and after. I kept trying to replay it, not because it helped, but because my mind refused to accept that there was no way to undo it. I kept running the math backward, looking for the one moment that could change the outcome.

If this. If that. If I had. If I didn't.

But there was no equation that brought him back, and the mind kept calculating anyway. That is what grief like that becomes. Not just sadness, but a machine that will not shut off.

And then came the night I was breaking open and reached for comfort, and heard instead, "Shut up. I have work tomorrow."

That moment did not just hurt. It taught something. It taught that pain has limits. That need has a volume cap. That if you are too loud in your worst moment, you become a problem instead of a person. After that, something changes. You learn to take your pain somewhere else. You learn to make it smaller. You learn to survive it quietly. Over time, you start to believe your pain doesn't belong anywhere at all.

The Blueprint

Those numbers don't excuse anything. They don't erase damage or remove responsibility. My survival strategies still affected real people in real ways, and I have to live with that fully.

But they also explain something I spent most of my life misunderstanding. I was not broken in isolation. I was conditioned. I was shaped by repeated experiences that trained my nervous system to treat the world as unstable and unsafe.

That kind of wiring does not stop just because life looks normal on the surface. You can function and still be drowning. You can work and still be collapsing inside. You can keep showing up and still be living in a body that never stopped bracing for impact.

For most of my life, I thought I was fighting myself. Now I understand something different. I was not fighting myself. I was running survival software in a system that never got to stand down.

That is the math.

ACE 6.

PCL-5 60.

PHQ-9 20.

Not just numbers. Not just scores. Not an excuse and not a sentence.

A map.

They showed what happens when early trauma meets a life with no margin for healing. They showed the shape of the wound and the shape of the cage around it.

The pain was real. The substance use was real. The prescriptions were real. The dependence was real. The poverty was real. The exhaustion was real. The damage was real. The responsibility is real.

All of it has to be true at the same time.

It kept me alive.

But it was never going to make me free.

CHAPTER 11

WHEN LOVE FELT LIKE DEATH

I did not know the word trauma bond when Chastidy happened. I only knew I loved someone in a way that felt bigger than reason, bigger than self-respect, and bigger than anything she could do to me. I did not understand why I could see what was happening and still not be able to walk away. I could know something was wrong and still want her. I could be hurt, confused, angry, embarrassed, and still feel like losing her would destroy me.

That was the part I could not explain. It was not normal heartbreak. It was not just being young and stupid. It was not just wanting somebody who did not want me the same way. It felt like my whole body had attached itself to her, and no amount of logic could cut it loose. I could tell myself the truth and still not feel free from it. I could list the reasons I should leave, and then one small piece of attention from her could erase the whole list.

That was the first time I remember being attached like that. Not just attracted, and not just interested. Attached. Almost obsessed. And I knew it. I knew something about it was too much. I knew I was reacting bigger than the situation should have required, but knowing that did not make it stop.

That is one of the cruelest parts of trauma. You can be aware enough to know something is wrong and still not be regulated enough to change it.

With Chastidy, I thought I was in love. Maybe part of me was. I am not trying to rewrite every feeling I had and call it fake. The feelings were real, and that was the problem. They were too real. They were bigger than the relationship itself. They came from somewhere deeper than the person standing in front of me. She was not just a girl I cared about. She became a doorway into every old wound I did not have language for yet.

When she pulled away, it did not feel like disappointment. It felt like abandonment. When she hurt me, it did not make me stop wanting her. It made me want to fix it. When she gave me attention again, it felt like relief. Not happiness. Relief. Like my body had been holding its breath and finally got one small inhale.

That should have told me something, but I did not know what I was looking at. I thought love was supposed to be powerful. I thought it was supposed to take over. I thought if I could not let go, that proved it meant something. I did not know the inability to let go could also be a symptom. I did not know obsession could wear the mask of devotion. I did not know a nervous system raised in instability could confuse intensity for connection. I just knew I wanted her no matter what, and that scared me because even then, some part of me knew I had disappeared inside it.

It wasn't that I couldn't "just let go." People say that like letting go is a door handle, like you just open your hand and release whatever is hurting you. That wasn't what it felt like inside me.

Letting go felt like death. Not sadness. Not disappointment. Death.

Something in my body reacted to abandonment like it was the end of oxygen. Like if that person left, I didn't just lose the relationship; I lost the part of me that knew how to stay alive inside it.

That is hard to admit because it sounds wrong. It sounds exaggerated. It sounds like obsession.

Maybe from the outside, that is what it looked like. But inside, it felt like survival.

When Garrett died, the grief was enormous. It tore through me. It left guilt behind that I still carried for years. But Garrett was gone. There was a terrible finality to it. Abandonment was different because abandonment kept happening in real time. It was the person still alive, still out there, still reachable, still choosing distance. That kind of loss did not close. It stayed open and kept asking me to solve it.

That was why it felt worse than death sometimes. Not because they mattered more than my brother, but because my nervous system could not stop treating their leaving as something I had to prevent. If I could just say it right, explain enough, become what they needed, fix the misunderstanding, get one more conversation, one more message, one more chance, then maybe the death feeling would stop.

That was the trap. I thought I was fighting for love. Most of the time, I was fighting withdrawal from attachment.

After Chastidy, the pattern did not stop. It changed names.

There was Trinity, off and on, between the other relationships. That kind of off-and-on connection can do something dangerous to a person who already has abandonment wounds. It does not let the wound close. It keeps reopening it just enough to keep hope alive. You never fully lose the person, so you never fully grieve them. You keep one hand on the door, waiting to see if it opens again.

I did not understand intermittent reinforcement back then. I did not know that unpredictable love can become more addictive than steady love. When affection comes and goes, the body starts chasing the return of it. It becomes a cycle: panic, hope, relief, crash, and then the same thing all over again.

Every time the person comes back, it feels like proof that the bond is real. Every time they leave again, it feels like proof that you were never enough. That kind of pattern does not just hurt your feelings. It trains your body. It teaches you to wait, to scan, and to accept crumbs because crumbs feel better than starvation. When you grew up already feeling emotionally starved, crumbs can feel like a feast.

I wish I could say I saw the pattern after the first time and stopped repeating it. I did not. I carried it forward because I still did not understand what it was. I thought every new person was a new story, but most of the time my nervous system was reading from the same old script.

Then came Tina.

With Tina, I thought I really loved her. I believed it with everything in me. From around 2020 to 2022, that attachment took hold of me in a way that felt impossible to explain from the outside. It was not clean, calm, or steady. It was the kind of love that made me feel like I could not breathe without it. Because I did not understand trauma bonds, I called that love too.

Tina became another place where the old wound found a home. I was already unraveling during those years. Addiction was getting worse. My marriage had fallen apart. My mother died. Garrett was still a wound that never stopped bleeding. I was carrying grief, shame, meth, alcohol, work, exhaustion, and a nervous system that did not know how to come down. So when attachment came, it did not land in a healthy place. It landed in survival mode.

That changes everything. When you are regulated, love can be a choice. When you are drowning, love can become a life raft, even if the life raft is full of holes. You hold on because the water feels worse. You hold on because letting go feels like sinking. You hold on because your body does not believe you will survive the drop.

That was the truth I did not have words for yet. I was not just afraid of losing Tina. I was afraid of what losing her woke up inside me. The abandonment did not feel like normal loss. It felt like death.

I need to say that carefully because people misunderstand it. I am not saying it mattered more than Garrett. I am not saying losing a relationship is the same as losing my brother. Garrett's death broke something in time. That grief is its own thing, and nothing replaces it. But abandonment hit a different system in me.

Garrett was grief. Abandonment was survival.

When Tina pulled away, or when I thought I was losing her, my body did not process it like sadness. It processed it like danger. Like the floor had disappeared. Like I was a child again with no protection, no control, and no way to make the pain stop. The feeling was so primitive that logic could not reach it. It did not care what made sense. It did not care what was healthy. It only cared that the person felt far away and I needed to get them back before the death feeling swallowed me.

That is a dangerous place to love from because then love stops being about seeing the other person clearly. It becomes about stopping your own collapse.

I did not know that. I thought I was loyal. I thought I was devoted. I thought I was proving that I loved harder than people who left. But sometimes what I called loyalty was terror. Sometimes what I called devotion was panic. Sometimes what I called love was my nervous system begging not to be abandoned again.

Then came Kristina.

Kristina scared me in a different way because I did not want her at first. I did not want a relationship. I was still crying over Tina every day. I had walls up, and they were thick. I saw red flag after red flag. I told myself no. I told myself not this time. I did not even feel drawn to her in the beginning. I did not look at her and think, this is what I want.

That should have protected me. It did not.

Out of nowhere, the walls crashed. Not slowly, not through trust, and not through time. They just came down. One day I was guarded, uninterested, and suspicious. Then suddenly I was obsessed. I thought I was in love. I thought I could not live without her. I could see things that should have made me step back, but my body had already stepped forward without permission.

That was when I knew something was wrong. Not just with her, but with me. With the way my system attached. With the way danger could register in my mind while attachment still took over my body.

I started researching because I needed an answer. Love bombing, gaslighting, blame shifting, dark triad, quiet BPD. Every term opened another door. Every video, article, and checklist sounded like someone had been following me around with a notebook. I thought I had found myself in quiet BPD. I told people that. I wrote about it. I tried to explain my life through that lens because it was the first lens that made any kind of sense.

But it still wasn't the whole truth.

After Kristina took my promotion, after I got fired, after I lost my apartment and moved back to Arkansas, the fear got worse in a way I could not explain away with relationship language anymore. It was not just attachment. It was my whole body.

Walking to the mailbox felt like walking onstage in front of the world. I would stand inside and try to talk myself into it like I was preparing for combat. Hand on the door. Chest tight. Mind racing.

Every step outside feeling visible. Too visible.

My room felt like a bunker. The walls were thin, but they felt like protection. Outside them, the enemy was invisible. Not a person exactly, and not one threat I could name. Just the sense that danger was waiting on the other side of everything.

That was when I finally went to therapy, and in two minutes, the word changed.

Not quiet BPD. Complex PTSD.

CHAPTER 12

Complex PTSD did not erase what I had done. It did not undo the damage. It did not make the relationships clean or make me innocent. But it explained the machinery. It explained why love felt like threat, why distance felt like death, why I attached to people who hurt me, why red flags did not stop the pull, why abandonment could make me feel like I was disappearing, and why I kept mistaking activation for love.

That was the difference. I had spent years asking what was wrong with me. Therapy gave me a better question: what happened to me enough times that my body learned to love like this?

That question did not fix everything, but it gave me a map. Once you have a map, you can at least stop calling every wrong turn your identity.

THE BUNKER

By the time I came back to Arkansas, I wasn't coming home in any clean way.

I had lost the apartment. I had lost the job. I had lost the version of myself I had been trying to hold together in North Dakota. The promotion I thought might finally prove something had been taken from me before I ever got to stand inside it, and then the job itself was gone too.

What I had called a fresh start had turned into another place where the same pattern caught up with me.

I came back carrying more than bags.

I carried the shame of failing again. I carried Tina. I carried Kristina. I carried Garrett. I carried my mother. I carried the kids being gone from my daily life. I carried the old addiction, the work addiction, the relationship withdrawals, the quiet BPD label I had tried to use as a map, and the fear that maybe none of it mattered because I was just the problem everywhere I went.

But underneath all of that was something even heavier.

I felt like I had failed as a man.

Not in some abstract way. Deeply. In my chest. In my stomach. In the way I looked at myself.

I had gone north trying to prove I could still build something. A job. A reputation. A place to live.

Some version of stability. I wanted to believe I could become the kind of man who recovered through effort, who outworked the past, who came back with proof that he was not what people thought.

Instead, I came back without the apartment. Without the job. Without the promotion. Without the relationship. Without the version of myself I had been trying to become. That kind of failure does something to you when you already measure your worth by usefulness.

It does not just feel like losing things. It feels like losing the right to respect yourself.

Arkansas didn't feel like home when I came back.

It felt like exposure.

The same roads were there. The same towns. The same stores. The same kind of air.
But I wasn't the same person walking through it. Or maybe I was the same person, just with fewer ways left to hide it.

North Dakota had isolated the fire. Arkansas made me feel like everyone could see the smoke.

At first, I thought I was just embarrassed. That would have made sense. I had come back without the job, without the apartment, without the relationship, without the proof I had been trying so hard to build. I thought maybe I just didn't want people seeing me like that.

But it was bigger than embarrassment.

Walking outside felt like stepping into a spotlight I had not agreed to stand in.

Even going to the mailbox became a task I had to negotiate with myself. I would stand inside, looking at the door, trying to talk my body into something my mind knew was simple. It was just a mailbox. Just a few steps. Just outside and back. Nothing dramatic. Nothing dangerous.

But my body did not believe that.

My chest would tighten before my hand even touched the door. My stomach would drop. My mind would start running every possible way someone could see me, judge me, stop me, ask me a question, notice that I was not okay. The distance from the door to the mailbox felt longer than it was, not because of the space, but because of what my body attached to it.

Being seen felt dangerous.

Not noticed in a normal way. Not recognized. Seen.

Like if somebody looked at me too long, they would see the whole wreckage. The addiction. The failures. The broken relationships. The shame. The desperate attachment. The job loss. The apartment loss. The man who kept trying to become stable and kept coming back with less than he left with.

So I stayed inside.

My room became a bunker.

That is the only word that fits. It was not just a bedroom. It was the place where I could control the light, the sound, the door, the distance between me and the world. The walls were thin, but they still felt like protection. Outside them, the enemy was invisible. Not one person. Not one threat. Not something I could point to and explain. Just the sense that danger was waiting on the other side of everything.

That kind of fear is hard to explain to someone who has never felt it. From the outside, it can look like laziness, isolation, depression, or refusing to participate in life. From the inside, it feels like your body is asking you not to die.

I could know I was safe and still feel hunted.

That is the part people miss. Knowledge does not automatically regulate the body. I could tell myself no one was outside waiting to attack me. I could tell myself the mailbox wasn't a stage. I could tell myself the store wasn't a battlefield. I could tell myself I was being irrational. None of that changed the way my body reacted when I reached for the door.

It felt like my nervous system had stopped taking instructions from me.

I started measuring life in smaller and smaller distances. First the room. Then the hallway. Then the door. Then maybe the mailbox, if I could get there. The world shrank, and somehow even the smaller version still felt too big.

I had been afraid before. I had been anxious before. I had been ashamed before. But this was different. This was not just not wanting to go somewhere. This was my body refusing the outside world like the outside world was poison.

The strange thing was, part of me still wanted to be normal. I wanted to walk outside without rehearsing it. I wanted to go to the store without needing the whole night to prepare. I wanted to answer a message without feeling pressure spike through my chest. I wanted to be able to do ordinary things without them becoming proof of how broken I felt.

But wanting did not make movement easy.

I had spent years believing I was quiet BPD. I had read enough, watched enough, written enough, and compared enough to convince myself I had found the answer. The attachment made sense through that lens. The intensity. The abandonment fear. The emotional swings. The way relationships felt like survival. The way I could feel obsessed even when I knew something was wrong.

It wasn't that the research was useless. It gave me language for things I had never named before. Love bombing. Gaslighting. Blame shifting. Dark triad. Intermittent reinforcement.

Trauma bonds. Those words helped me see patterns that had been invisible while I was inside them.

But the label still didn't explain the whole machine.

It didn't explain why a grocery store felt like an arena. It didn't explain why walking to the mailbox felt like stepping onstage in front of the world. It didn't explain why my room felt like a bunker, why sleep only came by accident, why my body scanned every room before I had a thought, or why I could lose the ability to move toward ordinary things I genuinely wanted to do.

That was when I finally went to therapy.

I didn't walk in expecting a miracle. I didn't even walk in expecting to be understood. By then, I was used to explaining myself and still feeling like I had missed the main point. I was used to handing people pieces and watching them build the wrong picture. I was used to being treated like the symptoms were the person.

But something happened fast.

Within minutes, the word changed.

Not quiet BPD.

Complex PTSD.

It was almost too simple after years of chasing myself through every possible explanation. I had spent so long trying to figure out what was wrong with me, and then someone looked at the whole shape of it and named what had been there the entire time.

Complex PTSD.

The words did not fix me. They did not undo the addiction. They did not repair the relationships.

They did not erase the damage I had caused or the years I had lost. They did not magically make my body feel safe walking to the mailbox.

But they changed the question.

For most of my life, the question had been, what is wrong with me?

That question had teeth. It blamed before it understood. It put me on trial every time I struggled.

It turned every symptom into evidence against my character.

Complex PTSD gave me a different question.

What happened enough times that my body learned to live like this?

That question did not excuse anything, but it opened a door I had never had before. It let me look at the whole pattern instead of just the latest failure. It connected the incubator to the blanket, the blanket to the scanning, the scanning to the drinking, the drinking to the pills, the pills to the work, the work to the burnout, the burnout to the relationships, the relationships to the abandonment panic, and the abandonment panic to the bunker I was living in now.

For the first time, my life did not look like random wreckage.

It looked like sequence.

A terrible sequence, but still a sequence.

That mattered.

Because if something has a sequence, it can be studied. If it can be studied, it can be understood. If it can be understood, maybe it does not have to stay in charge forever.

I began seeing the bunker differently after that. Not as proof that I was weak. Not as proof that I was lazy or crazy or broken beyond repair. The bunker was a symptom. It was my nervous system trying to create safety with the only tools it had left: walls, distance, avoidance, control, and silence.

It had protected me in its own distorted way.

It had also trapped me.

Both things were true.

That was one of the hardest parts of healing to accept. The same responses that kept me alive were also keeping me isolated. The same instincts that helped me survive danger were now treating the world itself like danger. The same body that once protected me by freezing, hiding, scanning, numbing, and staying useful was now using those tools against me because it did not know the war had changed.

Therapy did not make the outside world easy.

Some days, the mailbox still felt impossible. Some days, a store still felt like too much light, too many people, too much sound, too much exposure. Some days, answering the phone felt like stepping into danger. Some days, I still sat in the room with the invisible enemy on the other side of the walls.

But now there was a name for the enemy.

Not a person. Not the world. Not me.

Complex PTSD.

A nervous system shaped by years of threat, loss, shame, poverty, addiction, grief, abandonment, and survival.

That name did not make the fight disappear, but it helped me stop fighting the wrong opponent.

I had spent most of my life trying to defeat myself.

CHAPTER 12

Now I was beginning to understand that the thing I was fighting had been built inside me by things I never should have had to survive in the first place.

That understanding was not peace. Not yet. It was more like finding a light switch in a room I had been crawling through for years.

The room was still a mess when the light came on. The floor was still covered. The walls were still marked. The damage was still there.

But I could finally see where I was.

THE BUNKER

By the time I came back to Arkansas, I wasn't coming home in any clean way.

I had lost the apartment. I had lost the job. I had lost the version of myself I had been trying to hold together in North Dakota. The promotion I thought might finally prove something had been taken from me before I ever got to stand inside it, and then the job itself was gone too. What I had called a fresh start had turned into another place where the same pattern caught up with me.

I came back carrying more than bags.

I carried the shame of failing again. I carried Tina. I carried Kristina. I carried Garrett. I carried my mother. I carried the kids being gone from my daily life. I carried the old addiction, the work addiction, the relationship withdrawals, the quiet BPD label I had tried to use as a map, and the fear that maybe none of it mattered because I was just the problem everywhere I went.

But underneath all of that was something even heavier.

I felt like I had failed as a man.

Not in some abstract way. Deeply. In my chest. In my stomach. In the way I looked at myself.

I had gone north trying to prove I could still build something. A job. A reputation. A place to live.

Some version of stability. I wanted to believe I could become the kind of man who recovered through effort, who outworked the past, who came back with proof that he was not what people thought.

Instead, I came back without the apartment. Without the job. Without the promotion. Without the relationship. Without the version of myself I had been trying to become.

That kind of failure does something to you when you already measure your worth by usefulness.

It does not just feel like losing things. It feels like losing the right to respect yourself.

Arkansas didn't feel like home when I came back.

It felt like exposure.

The same roads were there. The same towns. The same stores. The same kind of air. But I wasn't the same person walking through it. Or maybe I was the same person, just with fewer ways left to hide it.

North Dakota had isolated the fire. Arkansas made me feel like everyone could see the smoke.

At first, I thought I was just embarrassed. That would have made sense. I had come back without the job, without the apartment, without the relationship, without the proof I had been trying so hard to build. I thought maybe I just didn't want people seeing me like that.

But it was bigger than embarrassment.

Walking outside felt like stepping into a spotlight I had not agreed to stand in.

Even going to the mailbox became a task I had to negotiate with myself. I would stand inside, looking at the door, trying to talk my body into something my mind knew was simple. It was just a mailbox. Just a few steps. Just outside and back. Nothing dramatic. Nothing dangerous.

But my body did not believe that.

My chest would tighten before my hand even touched the door. My stomach would drop. My mind would start running every possible way someone could see me, judge me, stop me, ask me a question, notice that I was not okay. The distance from the door to the mailbox felt longer than it was, not because of the space, but because of what my body attached to it. Being seen felt dangerous.

Not noticed in a normal way. Not recognized. Seen.

Like if somebody looked at me too long, they would see the whole wreckage. The addiction. The failures. The broken relationships. The shame. The desperate attachment. The job loss.

The

apartment loss. The man who kept trying to become stable and kept coming back with less than he left with.

So I stayed inside.

My room became a bunker.

That is the only word that fits. It was not just a bedroom. It was the place where I could control

the light, the sound, the door, the distance between me and the world. The walls were thin, but they still felt like protection. Outside them, the enemy was invisible. Not one person.

Not one threat. Not something I could point to and explain. Just the sense that danger was waiting on the other side of everything.

That kind of fear is hard to explain to someone who has never felt it. From the outside, it can look like laziness, isolation, depression, or refusing to participate in life. From the inside, it feels like your body is asking you not to die.

I could know I was safe and still feel hunted.

That is the part people miss. Knowledge does not automatically regulate the body. I could tell myself no one was outside waiting to attack me. I could tell myself the mailbox wasn't a stage. I could tell myself the store wasn't a battlefield. I could tell myself I was being irrational. None of that changed the way my body reacted when I reached for the door.

It felt like my nervous system had stopped taking instructions from me.

I started measuring life in smaller and smaller distances. First the room. Then the hallway. Then the door. Then maybe the mailbox, if I could get there. The world shrank, and somehow even the smaller version still felt too big.

I had been afraid before. I had been anxious before. I had been ashamed before. But this was different. This was not just not wanting to go somewhere. This was my body refusing the outside world like the outside world was poison.

The strange thing was, part of me still wanted to be normal. I wanted to walk outside without rehearsing it. I wanted to go to the store without needing the whole night to prepare. I wanted to answer a message without feeling pressure spike through my chest. I wanted to be able to do ordinary things without them becoming proof of how broken I felt. But wanting did not make movement easy.

I had spent years believing I was quiet BPD. I had read enough, watched enough, written enough, and compared enough to convince myself I had found the answer. The attachment made sense through that lens. The intensity. The abandonment fear. The emotional swings. The way relationships felt like survival. The way I could feel obsessed even when I knew something was wrong.

It wasn't that the research was useless. It gave me language for things I had never named before. Love bombing. Gaslighting. Blame shifting. Dark triad. Intermittent reinforcement.

Trauma bonds. Those words helped me see patterns that had been invisible while I was inside them.

But the label still didn't explain the whole machine.

It didn't explain why a grocery store felt like an arena. It didn't explain why walking to the mailbox felt like stepping onstage in front of the world. It didn't explain why my room felt like a bunker, why sleep only came by accident, why my body scanned every room before I had a thought, or why I could lose the ability to move toward ordinary things I genuinely wanted to do.

That was when I finally went to therapy.

I didn't walk in expecting a miracle. I didn't even walk in expecting to be understood. By then, I was used to explaining myself and still feeling like I had missed the main point. I was used to handing people pieces and watching them build the wrong picture. I was used to being treated like the symptoms were the person.

But something happened fast.

Within minutes, the word changed.

Not quiet BPD.

Complex PTSD.

It was almost too simple after years of chasing myself through every possible explanation. I had spent so long trying to figure out what was wrong with me, and then someone looked at the whole shape of it and named what had been there the entire time.

Complex PTSD.

The words did not fix me. They did not undo the addiction. They did not repair the relationships.

They did not erase the damage I had caused or the years I had lost. They did not magically make my body feel safe walking to the mailbox.

But they changed the question.

For most of my life, the question had been, what is wrong with me? That question had teeth. It blamed before it understood. It put me on trial every time I struggled.

It turned every symptom into evidence against my character.

Complex PTSD gave me a different question.

What happened enough times that my body learned to live like this?

That question did not excuse anything, but it opened a door I had never had before. It let me look at the whole pattern instead of just the latest failure. It connected the incubator to the blanket, the blanket to the scanning, the scanning to the drinking, the drinking to the pills, the pills to the work, the work to the burnout, the burnout to the relationships, the relationships to the abandonment panic, and the abandonment panic to the bunker I was living in now.

For the first time, my life did not look like random wreckage.

It looked like sequence.

A terrible sequence, but still a sequence.

That mattered.

Because if something has a sequence, it can be studied. If it can be studied, it can be understood. If it can be understood, maybe it does not have to stay in charge forever.

I began seeing the bunker differently after that. Not as proof that I was weak. Not as proof that I was lazy or crazy or broken beyond repair. The bunker was a symptom. It was my nervous system trying to create safety with the only tools it had left: walls, distance, avoidance, control, and silence.

It had protected me in its own distorted way.

It had also trapped me.

Both things were true.

That was one of the hardest parts of healing to accept. The same responses that kept me alive were also keeping me isolated. The same instincts that helped me survive danger were now treating the world itself like danger. The same body that once protected me by freezing, hiding, scanning, numbing, and staying useful was now using those tools against me because it did not know the war had changed.

Therapy did not make the outside world easy.

Some days, the mailbox still felt impossible. Some days, a store still felt like too much light, too many people, too much sound, too much exposure. Some days, answering the phone felt like stepping into danger. Some days, I still sat in the room with the invisible enemy on the other side of the walls.

But now there was a name for the enemy.

Not a person. Not the world. Not me.

Complex PTSD.

A nervous system shaped by years of threat, loss, shame, poverty, addiction, grief, abandonment, and survival.

That name did not make the fight disappear, but it helped me stop fighting the wrong opponent.

I had spent most of my life trying to defeat myself.

CHAPTER 13

Now I was beginning to understand that the thing I was fighting had been built inside me by things I never should have had to survive in the first place.

That understanding was not peace. Not yet. It was more like finding a light switch in a room I had been crawling through for years.

The room was still a mess when the light came on. The floor was still covered. The walls were still marked. The damage was still there.

But I could finally see where I was.

AFTER THE NAME

Getting the words Complex PTSD did not fix me.

That is the part people do not always understand about a diagnosis. A name can change everything and still not change your life overnight. It can explain the machinery, but it does not take the machinery apart for you. It can give you a map, but you still have to walk the ground with the same body that got lost there in the first place.

For me, the name was not a cure. It was the first honest sentence.

Complex PTSD.

Not lazy. Not weak. Not crazy. Not just an addict. Not just a man who ruined everything he touched. Not quiet BPD. Not some character flaw that followed me from job to job, relationship to relationship, crisis to crisis.

A nervous system shaped by repeated threat.

That mattered. But knowing it mattered did not make my chest stop tightening at the door. It did not make the mailbox easy. It did not make stores feel normal. It did not make sleep come like rest. It did not make my body suddenly trust people, rooms, silence, or myself.

The name explained the wound, but I still had to live inside the wound.

That was harder than I expected.

For a while, I wanted the diagnosis to be a door. I wanted it to open and let me walk out of the whole thing. I wanted the right word to undo years of wrong ones. I wanted to be able to say, “This is CPTSD,” and have my body finally stand down like it had been waiting for permission.

It did not work that way.

My body had spent decades learning the world through danger. It was not going to unlearn that because someone said the correct phrase in a therapy room. It had learned from the incubator.

It had learned from the blanket. It had learned from violence in the house, from police humiliation, from grief, from addiction, from work, from poverty, from abandonment, from trying to hold a family together while falling apart inside it.

That kind of learning does not leave politely.

It has to be met over and over.

At first, therapy felt strange because it gave me language faster than my body could believe it. I could understand something in a session and still walk out into the parking lot with my nervous system acting like nothing had changed. My mind could say, “You are safe,” while my body still scanned the lot, watched the cars, felt exposed under the open sky, and wanted to get back inside where the walls made sense.

That gap became one of the first things I had to learn.

Knowing is not healing.

Knowing is the start of healing.

There were days when that made me angry. I had already survived the events. I had already lived through the years. I had already paid the price in relationships, jobs, health, dignity, shame, and time. Part of me felt like understanding should have been enough. I wanted the explanation to count as release.

But the body does not release because you understand it once.

The body releases through repetition. Through safety happening again and again until the old prediction starts losing power. Through walking to the mailbox and coming back. Through answering the phone and not dying. Through sitting with a feeling long enough to realize it is not going to kill you. Through hearing silence and learning that silence is not always warning.

Through being seen and discovering that exposure is not always danger.

That sounds simple until you are the one doing it.

Some days, walking to the mailbox was not a chore. It was a full nervous-system event. I would stand there with my hand near the door and feel the argument inside me start. One part of me knew how ridiculous it sounded. Another part did not care. That second part was older than logic. It did not speak in reason. It spoke in alarm.

So I had to stop treating myself like a courtroom.

For most of my life, every symptom became evidence. If I froze, evidence. If I avoided, evidence. If I could not answer a message, evidence. If I got attached too fast, evidence. If I panicked over something small, evidence. If I slept in a chair, evidence. Evidence that I was weak, selfish, broken, dramatic, unstable, defective, or less of a man than I should have been.

Therapy slowly changed that.

Not all at once, and not perfectly. But it started changing the question. Instead of, “What is wrong with me?” I started asking, “What is my body trying to protect me from right now?”

That question did not excuse the behavior. It did not make every reaction okay. It did not erase the impact on other people. But it gave me a pause between the symptom and the shame. It gave me one small place to stand before the old verdict came down.

Sometimes the answer was obvious. My body was afraid of being judged. Sometimes it was afraid of conflict. Sometimes it was afraid of being trapped. Sometimes it was afraid someone would leave. Sometimes it was afraid I would need something and be punished for needing it.

Sometimes it was afraid of nothing I could name, because trauma does not always need a current threat to sound the alarm. Sometimes the alarm is just what the body remembers how to do.

That was one of the hardest things to accept. My body was not betraying me because it hated me. It was trying to protect me with outdated information.

The information had once been useful.

Get small. Stay quiet. Do not need. Do not move too fast. Do not speak too loud. Read the room. Watch the tone. Keep working. Stay useful. Do not disappoint. Do not trust calm. Do not assume anyone stays. Do not let grief make noise. Do not rest unless you collapse into it by accident.

Those rules had helped me survive certain environments. The problem was that my body kept using them everywhere.

That is how survival becomes a prison.

It does not announce itself as a prison. It announces itself as common sense. It tells you staying isolated is safer. It tells you not asking for help is smarter. It tells you overworking is responsible.

It tells you needing less makes you stronger. It tells you sleeping upright is just how you are. It tells you love is supposed to feel like panic because at least panic proves it matters.

Then one day you look around and realize the rules that kept you alive are also keeping you from living.

That realization hurt.

It hurt because it meant I could not keep blaming only the past while doing nothing in the present. It meant I had to take responsibility without turning responsibility into self-hatred. That balance is hard. I had spent years swinging between two extremes. Either everything was my fault, or nothing was. Neither one was true.

The truth was worse and more useful.

Some things were done to me. Some things shaped me before I had language, power, or choice. Some things trained my body before I ever had a chance to decide who I wanted to become.

And then, later, I hurt people from inside that training.

Both had to be true.

If I denied what happened to me, I stayed ashamed. If I denied what I did with it, I stayed dangerous. Healing had to hold both, or it would become just another story I told myself to avoid the full weight.

That is where the work started getting real.

Not in the big breakthroughs. Not in the dramatic moments where everything suddenly made sense. The real work was smaller and more annoying than that. It was noticing the first flash of panic before I reacted. It was catching the old urge to explain myself to someone who had already decided not to understand. It was learning that a feeling could be urgent without being accurate. It was learning that not every silence was abandonment and not every disagreement was danger.

It was learning that my nervous system could scream and still not be in charge.

That was new.

Before, when the alarm went off, I obeyed it. If attachment panic said chase, I chased. If shame said hide, I hid. If fear said numb, I numbed. If work said prove yourself, I overworked. If grief rose up, I swallowed it. I did not think of those as choices. They felt like instructions coming from somewhere deeper than thought.

Recovery started when I could feel the instruction and not immediately follow it.

Not every time.

Not even most times at first.

But sometimes.

Sometimes I could pause before sending the message. Sometimes I could recognize that the urge to explain was not clarity, it was panic. Sometimes I could look at the door and know my body was afraid without calling myself stupid for being afraid. Sometimes I could tell the difference between danger and activation. Sometimes I could admit I wanted to disappear and still stay in the room.

Those moments were small, but they mattered because they were the opposite of the old pattern.

The old pattern was automatic.

The new pattern had to be built.

That is another thing people miss about healing. You do not just stop being traumatized. You have to build something else strong enough to hold the space trauma used to occupy. If survival was the only structure you ever had, you cannot tear it down without replacing it. Otherwise, there is nothing left to stand on.

So I started building.

Slowly. Badly sometimes. With setbacks. With days where I knew better and still did the old thing. With moments where I could explain the pattern perfectly and still fall right into it. With shame after the fact. With anger at myself. With grief for how long it had taken to even understand the fight I was in.

But I was building.

I started learning that isolation was not peace. It was just quiet fear. I started learning that rest was not laziness. It was something my body had been denied so long it no longer recognized it.

I started learning that being useful was not the same as being loved. I started learning that a relationship feeling intense did not automatically mean it was real love. I started learning that the people who require you to abandon yourself in order to keep them are not safe places, no matter how much your nervous system wants them.

Those lessons did not come gently.

They came through loss. Through therapy. Through reading. Through writing. Through sitting with memories I had spent years outrunning. Through realizing that some of the things I hated about myself had been survival strategies that never got updated.

Writing became part of that update.

At first, I thought I was writing to explain myself to other people. Maybe I was. There were people I wanted to understand. My kids. My family. People who had seen only the collapse and not the machinery underneath it. People who thought they knew what addiction meant, what failure meant, what being late meant, what isolation meant, what obsession meant, what shame meant.

I wanted to say, "There was more happening than you saw."

But the more I wrote, the more I realized I was also writing to myself.

I was trying to put the pieces in order because my life had never felt ordered while I was living it.

Memory came like weather. One scene blowing into another. Incubator. Blanket. Dish pit.

Bathroom floor. Hydrocodone. Pregnancy. Garrett. North Dakota. Mailbox. Therapy room. They did not arrive in a neat line. They arrived the way trauma arrives, all at once, layered, loud, and unfinished.

Writing gave them sequence.

Not to make them pretty.

To make them visible.

That was the difference.

I was not trying to polish the wreckage until it looked acceptable. I was trying to stop drowning in it. I was trying to lay the pieces out and say, this happened, then this, then this, and this is what it taught my body, and this is how it showed up later when nobody understood why I reacted the way I did.

That is not excuse-making.

That is testimony.

There were still days I hated the word healing because it sounded too clean. People say healing like it is a warm light coming through a window. Sometimes healing is that. Sometimes it is ugly.

Sometimes it is shaking after a therapy session. Sometimes it is realizing you owe apologies you cannot make clean. Sometimes it is grieving the version of yourself who never got to be young. Sometimes it is understanding your parents better and still being angry about what happened. Sometimes it is loving your kids so much it hurts and knowing love alone does not erase the impact of your pain.

Sometimes healing is just not lying to yourself anymore.

That was where I was.

Not healed.

Not fixed.

Not transformed into some calm, inspirational version of myself who could talk about trauma from a safe distance.

I was still inside it. But now I could see more of the walls. I could see the old exits I kept trying to use. I could see the traps disguised as comfort. I could see how addiction had worked, how work had worked, how attachment had worked, how shame had worked.

I could see the machine.

And if I could see the machine, maybe I could stop mistaking it for my identity.

That became the next part of survival.

Not just staying alive.

Not just staying functional.

Not just making it through the next shift, the next relationship, the next panic, the next collapse.

The next part was learning how to live without needing the fire to tell me who I was.

I had been born into survival. I had built a life around survival. I had mistaken survival for strength, love, work ethic, loyalty, responsibility, and identity.

Now I had to learn something harder.

How to be a person when I was not only surviving.

I did not know how to do that yet.

But for the first time, I understood that not knowing did not mean I was hopeless.

It meant I was finally at the beginning of something honest.

Absolutely. Here is Chapter 14 rewritten complete, in fuller paragraph style, without the chopped-up one-line rhythm.

CHAPTER 14

THE SECOND WOUND

HOW STIGMA TURNS PAIN INTO SHAME

But the rescue boat was only half the story. The other half was what people called me for reaching for it.

Addict, weak, selfish, crazy, immature, nobody. They saw the boat and judged it, but they never looked at the water. That judgment became its own wound. The second wound. And in some ways, that wound almost killed me too.

They always made it sound simple. “It’s all in your head.” “You’re making yourself worse.” “Be a man.” “Grow up.” “Most people grow up.” “Aren’t you tired of being a nobody?”

They said it like they were helping, like shame was medicine and humiliation was a ladder. Like if they could just hit the right nerve, I would finally snap out of it, stand up straight, put the past behind me, and become the version of myself they were comfortable with.

But that is not how Complex PTSD works. That is not how a nervous system heals. That is not how a man comes back from a lifetime of being wired for danger.

Those words did not make me stronger. They made me disappear further inside myself. They took the parts of me that were already bleeding and told them they were embarrassing. They took survival responses I barely understood and turned them into character defects. They took pain that was already heavy and added shame on top of it.

That is the second wound: the first wound is what happened, and the second wound is what people say about you after it happened. The first wound is the incubator, the violence, the losses, the marriage, the drugs, the funerals, the closets, and the collapse. The second wound is being told your reaction to all of that means you are weak, selfish, crazy, lazy, immature, toxic, or broken.

Stigma does not stay outside the body. It gets in. It crawls under the skin. It changes the way you breathe, the way you look in the mirror, and the way silence sounds. It makes every mistake feel like proof, every missed call feel like rejection, every bad day feel like a verdict, and every setback feel like the final sentence on your life.

That is what people do not understand about direct stigma. It is not just an insult. It becomes evidence that you are weak, broken, too much, and alone. Evidence that nobody is coming.

Evidence that maybe the world would be better off without you in it.

That is where the danger starts. Not all at once, and not in some loud, dramatic way. It starts quietly, with a thought, a sentence, a small internal surrender. Maybe they are right. Maybe I am the problem. Maybe I am making myself worse. Maybe I am not a man. Maybe I am a nobody.

Maybe I am already gone.

IT'S ALL IN YOUR HEAD

People say "it's all in your head" like that proves it is not real. But where do they think terror lives? Where do they think memory lives? Where do they think panic starts? Where do they think the alarm system is?

Of course it is in my head. It is also in my body. It is in my stomach when it drops for no reason.

It is in my hands when they shake. It is in my jaw when it locks. It is in my chest when it tightens.

It is in my sleep when my body refuses to rest. It is in the way I hear footsteps, the way I hear a tone change, the way I notice a door closing too hard, and the way my body knows danger before my mind has words for it.

So yes, it is in my head. But that does not mean I invented it. That does not mean I chose it.

That does not mean I can just decide to stop.

Complex PTSD is not imagination. It is injury. It is the body remembering what the mind keeps trying to organize. It is the nervous system treating today like yesterday because yesterday never got resolved. It is what happens when danger gets repeated so many times that the brain stops asking, "Am I safe?" and starts assuming, "I am not."

When someone says, "It's all in your head," what they are really saying is, "I do not want to understand this."

And when you hear that enough, you stop trying to explain. You stop reaching. You stop correcting people. You stop saying, "No, this is real." You begin to wonder if maybe you are crazy.

That is how stigma works. It does not have to prove anything. It only has to make you doubt yourself.

YOU'RE MAKING YOURSELF WORSE

"You're making yourself worse" always sounded like responsibility. It sounded like they were calling me to own something, to wake up, to finally admit what I was doing to myself. But underneath it was accusation.

Like I was standing there with a shovel, digging my own grave on purpose. Like I enjoyed the panic. Like I enjoyed depression. Like I enjoyed destroying good things. Like I enjoyed being late, frozen, reactive, exhausted, ashamed, and trapped in my own skin.

People love to point at the pattern after it has already become a problem. They do not ask where it came from. They do not ask what it protected. They do not ask what it cost to survive before I ever had better tools.

Avoidance made sense when facing things meant being overwhelmed. Isolation made sense when people were unsafe. Anger made sense when softness got used against me. Numbing made sense when feeling everything would have killed me. Workaholism made sense when stopping meant hearing the screams inside my own head. Substances made sense when my nervous system was fighting for its life and nothing else reached it fast enough.

That does not mean those things were healthy. That does not mean they did not hurt people.

That does not mean I get to hide behind trauma and never change. But it does mean those patterns were not random. They were not proof that I did not care. They were not proof that I chose chaos over family. They were not proof that I wanted to be broken. They were survival strategies that stayed past their expiration date.

That is the part people miss. A thing can save you once and destroy you later. A thing can keep you alive in one season and keep you trapped in the next. That is why healing is so hard. You are not just giving up bad habits. You are letting go of the only things that once kept you alive.

So when someone says, "You're making yourself worse," they may be pointing at something real, but they are saying it in the most damaging way possible. Shame does not teach a nervous system safety. Shame teaches hiding. Shame teaches lying. Shame teaches silence. Shame teaches relapse. Shame teaches the body that people are still dangerous. A better sentence would have been, "I can see this is hurting you now, even if it helped you survive before."

That sentence leaves a door open. The other one shuts it.

BE A MAN

Nothing has killed more men quietly than that phrase.

Be a man.

Three words. A whole prison.

It means do not cry, do not shake, do not admit fear, do not say you are lonely, do not say you are drowning, do not say you miss your kids, do not say you are ashamed, do not say the memories still own parts of you, do not say you need help, and do not say you are scared of what you might do if the pain does not stop.

It means work, provide, shut up, take it, drink it down, smoke it down, work it off, fight it out, laugh it off, be useful, be hard, and be silent. And if silence starts killing you, at least die without making anyone uncomfortable.

That is what “be a man” really teaches.

It does not create strength. It creates emotional starvation. It teaches boys to become men who cannot name their pain until it comes out sideways as rage, addiction, withdrawal, control, self-destruction, a body always braced for war, and a mouth that says “I’m fine” while the soul crawls toward the edge.

I spent so much of my life trying to look okay that I did not know how to tell the truth without feeling weak. I thought being strong meant needing nothing. I thought being a man meant carrying everything alone. I thought if I could just work harder, hurt quieter, and keep moving, maybe nobody would notice how bad it was inside me.

But Complex PTSD does not disappear because a man refuses to cry. It goes underground. It grows teeth. It waits. Then it comes out in the parts of life he wanted most to protect: his marriage, his children, his work, his body, his faith, his ability to sleep, and his ability to feel joy without fear.

“Be a man” did not save me. It helped bury me.

Real manhood is not silence. Real manhood is not pretending pain does not exist. Real manhood is facing the truth without running from it. It is apologizing. It is healing. It is staying alive. It is letting someone see the wound before the wound becomes a weapon.

A man asking for help is not failing at being a man. He is refusing to let shame write the ending.

GROW UP People say “grow up” when they think the problem is maturity. But trauma does not care how old you are. You can be grown and still carry a terrified child inside your nervous system. You can have bills, jobs, kids, responsibilities, and gray in your beard, and still have parts of you frozen in rooms nobody ever rescued you from.

That is not childish. That is trauma.

There were parts of me that grew up too fast. Parts that learned to read danger before I learned to feel safe. Parts that learned to survive adults before I knew how to be a child. Parts that learned to keep going no matter what.

But there were other parts that never got to grow right. Parts that never learned trust. Parts that never learned secure love. Parts that never learned how to calm down after fear. Parts that never learned that conflict does not always mean abandonment. Parts that never learned that rest is safe. Parts that never learned that I could be loved without performing, pleasing, fixing, or proving.

So when someone says, “Grow up,” they are talking to a wound like it is a bad attitude. They are yelling at a survival state. They are shaming the part of a person that actually needs the most care.

That does not mean adults with Complex PTSD have no responsibility. I am responsible for what I do now. I am responsible for healing. I am responsible for repair. I am responsible for learning different responses. I am responsible for not using my wounds as permission to wound others.

But responsibility without compassion turns into punishment. And punishment is not healing.

A better sentence would have been, “You are an adult now, and you deserve help healing the parts of you that had to survive too early.”

That sentence tells the truth. It does not excuse. It does not shame. It gives the grown man and the wounded child a way to exist in the same body without hating each other.

AREN'T YOU TIRED OF BEING A NOBODY?

That one goes straight for the soul.

“Aren't you tired of being a nobody?”

As if I had not already asked myself that in a thousand different ways. As if I had not already looked at my life and counted the wreckage. As if I had not already measured myself against other men and found myself behind.

Behind in money, stability, family, peace, reputation, and everything I thought I was supposed to be by now.

A person with Complex PTSD does not need help feeling like a failure. Most of us already have that covered. We carry invisible scoreboards in our heads: every lost job, every relapse, every broken relationship, every missed chance, every person we hurt, every person who left, and every time we said, "This time will be different," then watched the same fire start again.

So when someone says, "Aren't you tired of being a nobody?" they think they are lighting a fire under you. They do not realize they are pouring gasoline on shame.

Because the real wound is not laziness. It is grief. Grief for the life that might have been. Grief for the person I could have become if I had not spent so many years surviving. Grief for the father I wanted to be. Grief for the husband I failed to be. Grief for the son, brother, friend, worker, and man I kept trying to become while dragging a war behind me.

Calling someone a nobody does not motivate them. It confirms the lie trauma already planted:

that their life has no weight, that their existence is a burden, and that they are only visible when they fail.

No one heals by being convinced they are worthless. People heal when they can believe there is still something in them worth saving.

SHAME: THE WOUND UNDER THE WOUND

Guilt says, "I did something wrong." Shame says, "I am wrong." That difference matters. Guilt can lead to repair. Shame leads to hiding. Guilt can say, "I need to make this right." Shame says, "I ruin everything I touch." Guilt can lead a man to apologize. Shame can lead him to disappear.

Complex PTSD is full of shame. Not normal shame, and not the kind that passes after a mistake. Deep shame. Identity shame. The kind that says your very existence is a problem.

The kind that started before you had words.

The kind that came from being hurt, then blamed. Neglected, then called needy. Controlled, then called difficult. Abused, then told to keep quiet. Broken, then told you were too sensitive.

That kind of shame does not leave just because time passes. It becomes the voice inside your head. Then direct stigma gives that voice a microphone.

"It's all in your head" becomes, see, your pain is fake. "You're making yourself worse" becomes, see, this is your fault. "Be a man" becomes, see, you are weak. "Grow up" becomes, see, you are pathetic. "Aren't you tired of being a nobody?" becomes, see, your life does not matter.

That is how outside voices become inside voices. That is how people who harmed you keep speaking through people who never even knew the original wound.

That is why words matter. Some words do not just hurt. They install themselves.

GUILT: THE WEIGHT THAT TURNS AGAINST YOU

Guilt is complicated.

Some guilt is real. I have hurt people. I have failed people. I have made choices that caused damage. I have reacted from wounds and left wounds in others. I cannot pretend that did not happen. Trauma explains some of it, but it does not erase the impact.

That is the hard truth.

But there is another kind of guilt that trauma creates. False guilt. The guilt of believing you should have been able to stop what happened to you. The guilt of believing you should have left sooner. The guilt of believing you should have fought harder. The guilt of believing you should have known better as a child. The guilt of believing you are responsible for everyone's pain. The guilt of needing help. The guilt of not being healed fast enough. The guilt of surviving in ugly ways.

Stigma mixes real guilt and false guilt together until a person cannot tell the difference. Then guilt stops being a signal for repair and becomes a sentence.

It says, "You have done too much damage." It says, "You cannot come back from this."
It says,

"You do not deserve forgiveness." It says, "Everyone would be better off without you."

That last sentence is where guilt becomes deadly, because suicidal thinking often does not arrive wearing the face of death. Sometimes it arrives wearing the face of logic. It tells you it would be merciful to leave. It tells you your absence would be a gift. It tells you you have become too heavy for everyone else to carry. It tells you disappearing would finally make the pain stop.

That is not truth. That is shame talking in a calm voice. That is guilt after it has been poisoned.

That is stigma after it has moved inside the bloodstream.

WHEN STIGMA BECOMES SUICIDAL PAIN

Nobody wants to talk about this part directly, but we have to.

Direct stigma can push a person closer to suicide. Not always by itself, and not like one sentence automatically does it. But when those sentences stack on top of years of trauma, grief, isolation, addiction, rejection, exhaustion, and self-hatred, they can become part of the weight that breaks a person.

A man with Complex PTSD may already be tired in a way sleep cannot fix. He may already be fighting memories he cannot explain. He may already be carrying regret that eats him alive. He may already feel like he lost too much time. He may already believe his family sees only the worst parts of him. He may already think his children will never understand. He may already feel like his name has been ruined. He may already feel like every attempt to get better ends with him back in the same hole.

Then someone says, "Be a man." Someone says, "Grow up." Someone says, "You're making yourself worse." Someone says, "Aren't you tired of being a nobody?" And something inside him folds.

Not because he is weak. Because he was already carrying too much.

People think suicide is always a loud crisis. Sometimes it is quiet. Sometimes it is a man sitting alone, staring at nothing, feeling like he has already become a ghost. Sometimes it is him laughing with people during the day and fighting not to die at night. Sometimes it is him making jokes because honesty would scare everyone. Sometimes it is him saying, "I'm tired," and nobody hears what he means.

Sometimes it is him believing that staying alive has become an inconvenience to everyone else.

That is why stigma is dangerous. It does not just judge pain. It isolates pain. And isolated pain starts looking for an exit.

If you are reading this and you know that place, hear me clearly: you do not have to fix your whole life tonight. You do not have to solve every regret. You do not have to become who you were supposed to be before morning. You only have to stay. One breath. One minute. One phone call. One door between you and the weapon. One message to someone who can sit with you. One call to 988 if you are in the United States. One moment of not letting shame make the final decision.

The part of you that wants the pain to stop is not your enemy. But death is not the only way pain stops. Healing is slower, messier, and harder, but it leaves you here to see what can still be rebuilt.

ACCOUNTABILITY WITHOUT DEHUMANIZATION

A lot of people hide cruelty behind “tough love.” They say, “I’m just being honest.” But honesty without compassion is often just violence with better manners.

Real tough love has boundaries. Fake tough love has contempt. Real tough love says, “I love you, but I will not enable what is destroying you.” Fake tough love says, “You are pathetic.” Real tough love says, “What you did hurt me, and it has to change.” Fake tough love says, “You are nothing.” Real tough love says, “Your trauma matters, but so does your responsibility.” Fake tough love says, “Stop using trauma as an excuse.”

Real tough love leaves a path forward. Fake tough love leaves a person standing in shame with nowhere to go.

That is the difference.

People with Complex PTSD do not need lies. They do not need coddling. They do not need everyone pretending the damage is not real. They need truth, but truth does not have to strip a person of dignity. Truth does not have to spit on the wound. Truth does not have to make a man feel like dying is the only honorable thing left.

This is where people get scared. They think if we understand trauma, we excuse everything.

No.

Understanding is not excusing. Explanation is not permission. Compassion is not a blank check.

A person with Complex PTSD can still cause harm. A person with Complex PTSD can still lie, rage, use, avoid, manipulate, abandon, or destroy trust. Those things have to be faced, but they have to be faced in a way that does not turn the person into garbage.

There is a way to say, "You hurt me," without saying, "You are worthless." There is a way to say,

"You need help," without saying, "You are crazy." There is a way to say, "I cannot live in this chaos," without saying, "You are impossible to love." There is a way to say, "You are responsible for healing," without saying, "Your wound is your fault."

That difference can save lives, because shame does not create accountability. Shame creates defense. Shame creates collapse. Shame creates secrecy. Shame creates relapse. Shame creates the belief that repair is impossible.

Accountability says, "You did harm. Now take the next right step."

Stigma says, "You are harm."

One gives a person a road. The other gives them a grave.

WHAT PEOPLE SHOULD HAVE SAID

They could have said, "I do not fully understand what is happening inside you, but I believe it is real."

They could have said, "I can see you are stuck in patterns that are hurting you, and I want you to get help."

They could have said, "You do not have to hide pain to prove you are a man."

They could have said, "You are grown now, and you are responsible for healing, but I know the wound started before you had control."

They could have said, "You are not a nobody. You are wounded. You are stuck. You are still here. That means something."

They could have said, "I will not excuse harmful behavior, but I will not shame you for being injured."

They could have said, "What happened to you matters."

They could have said, "What you do next matters too."

They could have said, "Stay."

Sometimes one word matters. Stay. Not "get over it." Not "man up." Not "stop being dramatic."

Stay long enough to feel something different. Stay long enough to learn what safety feels like.

Stay long enough to repair what can be repaired. Stay long enough to become someone you have not met yet. Stay long enough for your children to one day understand more than they understand right now. Stay long enough for your nervous system to learn that the war is not the whole story.

WHAT STIGMA STOLE

Stigma stole time. It stole language. It stole help. It stole trust.

It made me think pain was weakness. It made me think needing people was dangerous. It made me think my symptoms were proof that I was defective. It made me hide the truth until the truth came out sideways. It made me apologize for being wounded before I even understood the wound. It made me believe I had to earn the right to be treated like a human being.

That is what stigma does. It does not just misunderstand trauma. It extends it. It becomes another unsafe room, another accusing voice, another reason not to reach out, another reason to stay silent, another reason to die quietly.

And I am done pretending that is harmless.

THE TRUTH

The truth is, Complex PTSD is not weakness. It is not immaturity. It is not drama. It is not a man refusing to grow up. It is not someone making himself worse because he enjoys suffering.

It is what happens when survival gets wired so deeply that peace feels foreign. It is what happens when the body learns danger before it learns safety. It is what happens when shame becomes the language a person speaks to himself.

Healing does not come from more shame. Healing comes from truth with dignity, accountability with compassion, boundaries without cruelty, support without control, and responsibility without humiliation.

A person with Complex PTSD does not need the world to pretend he has caused no harm. He needs the world to understand that harm and wound can live in the same body. He needs someone to say, "You are responsible for what you do next," and also, "You are not beyond saving."

Because sometimes that is the sentence that keeps a person alive.

Not "be a man." Not "grow up." Not "you're a nobody." This: "You are not beyond saving."

For a man who has spent his whole life believing shame was the final truth, that sentence can become the first crack of light.

Stigma told me the symptoms meant I was broken. The next truth was harder and cleaner: my body had been keeping records long before I had language.

The shame was loud.

But the body had the receipts.

CHAPTER 16

WHAT I COULD NOT GIVE THEM YET

Understanding my nervous system did not undo what my children lived through.

That was one of the hardest truths to face after I finally had language for Complex PTSD. The language helped me understand myself, but it did not erase the impact of my symptoms on the people closest to me. It did not go backward and make me calmer in the rooms where I was tense. It did not make me more present in the years where I was half there and half somewhere else. It did not remove the worry, confusion, absence, instability, or silence they had to live around.

That was painful because I loved my kids the whole time.

That part was never fake.

Maverick, Shayla, Teaguen, and Adalee were not side characters in my life. They were the reason I kept trying when I did not understand what I was trying against. They were the reason I worked, the reason I got up, the reason I tried to hold things together even when the way I held things together was hurting me. I did not break because of them. I kept going because of them.

But love does not automatically make a wounded person safe.

That sentence hurts to write because it sounds colder than the love I feel. But it is true. Love was there, but so was fear. Love was there, but so was addiction. Love was there, but so was shame, exhaustion, grief, poverty, panic, and a nervous system that kept reacting to life like danger was always about to enter the room.

I wanted to be a good father. I wanted to be solid. I wanted to be the kind of man my kids could look back on and say, "He was there. He was steady. He made us feel safe." But wanting that did not mean I knew how to become it. I knew how to work. I knew how to provide. I knew how to fix things, carry things, endure things, and keep moving when my body was begging me to stop. I knew how to stay useful.

I did not always know how to be emotionally safe.

That difference matters.

A child does not only need food, clothes, shoes, and a roof. Those things matter, and I know they matter because I watched my own mother fight to make sure we had them. But a child also needs calm they can trust. They need a parent whose presence does not feel unpredictable.

They need repair after conflict. They need someone who can explain what is happening without handing them adult pain to carry. They need to know they are not responsible for the weather in the house.

I did not understand that fully when I was younger. I thought providing was the same as protecting. I thought working hard was the same as loving well. I thought if I could keep the lights on, keep food in the house, keep bills from swallowing us completely, and keep showing up for work, then I was doing the job.

Part of that was true.

Part of it was not enough.

That is the hard place where accountability lives. Not in pretending I never tried, and not in pretending trying erased the damage. I did try. I tried hard. I tried with the tools I had, but some of those tools were broken before I ever picked them up. Some of those tools were survival responses I mistook for manhood. Some were addiction. Some were silence. Some were work.

Some were the belief that if I kept everything moving, maybe nobody would notice how much of me was missing.

Children notice more than adults think they do.

They may not know the words. They may not understand addiction, Complex PTSD, trauma bonds, depression, hypervigilance, or shame. They may not understand why a parent is present one moment and unreachable the next. But they feel the room. They feel tension. They feel absence even when someone is physically there. They feel when love is real but buried under something heavy.

I know that because I was that child once.

I felt things before I understood them. I knew when a room changed even if nobody explained it to me. I knew when someone was angry before they said they were angry. I knew when silence meant danger. I knew how to disappear before I had language for why I was disappearing.

That is what scares me most when I look back. Not that my children had my exact childhood.

They did not. Their story is not a copy of mine. But pain does not have to repeat exactly to be passed down. Sometimes it changes clothes. Sometimes it moves from violence to silence, from chaos to emotional distance, from fear in the house to fear in the nervous system of the parent trying to hold the house together.

That is what I mean when I say this book is me trying to stop handing it down.

I cannot change what they already saw. I cannot rewrite the years. I cannot force them to understand me on my timeline. I cannot demand forgiveness because I finally found the right diagnosis. I cannot use Complex PTSD as a shield against their pain. If they hurt, that hurt matters. If they are angry, that anger has a place. If they remember things differently than I do, I have to make room for that too.

That is another hard truth: my explanation is not the only truth in the room. For years, I wanted people to understand me so badly that understanding became almost desperate. I wanted to explain why I used, why I froze, why I stayed, why I left, why I worked too much, why I disappeared, why I fell apart, why attachment felt like death, why I could not just “be normal.” I wanted the full picture seen because I had spent so long being judged by the wreckage without anyone looking at the water.

But when it comes to my kids, I have to be careful.

Explaining myself cannot become asking them to comfort me.

That is not their job.

They were never supposed to be my jury, my therapist, my rescue boat, or the people who made my pain meaningful. They are my children. Even as they get older, even as they form their own opinions, even if one day they read these pages and understand more than they understood before, they still do not owe me the role of carrying my story for me.

That is why this book has to be testimony, not a demand.

I am not writing it to say, "You have to forgive me now." I am writing it to say, "Here is what was happening underneath the parts you may have seen. Here is the map I did not have. Here is the machinery I did not understand. Here is what I am responsible for, and here is what shaped me before I knew how to choose differently."

Those are not the same thing.

Forgiveness, if it ever comes, cannot be pulled out of someone. It has to be free, or it is not forgiveness. Understanding can be offered, but it cannot be forced. Repair can be attempted, but it cannot be controlled. That is hard for a nervous system like mine because abandonment panic wants to chase, explain, plead, fix, and close the gap before it swallows me. But fatherhood cannot be built on my panic.

If I want to stop the cycle, I have to learn to let their feelings exist without making them responsible for mine.

That may be one of the most important repairs I can make.

I can say I am sorry without demanding that the apology fix everything. I can tell the truth without using the truth as pressure. I can admit I was wounded without asking them to excuse what the wound caused. I can love them without needing them to prove I am still lovable. I can stay alive and keep healing even if the repair takes longer than I want, even if some bridges never look the same again.

That is the work now.

Not the old work of proving myself through exhaustion. Not the work of being useful enough to outrun shame. Not the work of overexplaining until someone finally sees me. Not the work of chasing love like oxygen.

A different kind of work.

The work of becoming safer. The work of telling the truth cleanly. The work of not passing my panic into their hands. The work of learning how to be present without needing the room to reassure me.

I do not know how to do all of that perfectly. I am still learning. Some days I still feel the old shame rise up and try to turn every mistake into identity. Some days I still want to disappear before someone can reject me. Some days I still feel the urge to explain too much because silence feels like being erased. Some days I still grieve the father I wanted to be and the years I cannot get back.

But grief is not the same as giving up.

Regret can either become a grave or a guide. For a long time, mine became a grave. I climbed into it with every failure and called it truth. I told myself I had ruined too much, lost too much, damaged too much, and fallen too far behind to become anything different.

I do not believe that the same way anymore.

I believe damage is real. I believe consequences are real. I believe some things cannot be undone. But I also believe a person can become more honest than he was. More accountable.

More aware. More capable of repair. Not perfect. Not magically healed. But less dangerous to himself and to the people he loves.

That matters.

My kids deserved a father who understood himself sooner. They deserved a father who knew that his body was living in survival mode before survival mode spilled into the house. They deserved a father who could name pain without being swallowed by shame. They deserved a father who knew how to rest, how to ask for help, how to feel grief, how to be steady, and how to love without fear driving the whole machine.

I cannot go back and give them that version of me.

But I can become closer to him now.

That is not enough to erase the past. I know that. But it is enough to keep the past from being the only thing I hand forward.

That is why I keep writing. That is why I keep going back through memories I would rather leave buried. That is why I keep naming things that make me feel exposed. Not because I want pity.

Not because I want to make myself the victim in every room. Not because I think understanding my pain cancels out the pain of others.

I am writing because silence is how cycles survive.

Silence kept me confused. Silence kept me ashamed. Silence kept me calling symptoms character flaws. Silence kept me trying to be a man by not needing anything. Silence kept grief trapped in my body until it came out sideways. Silence kept me from knowing the difference between love and abandonment panic. Silence kept me from seeing how poverty, trauma, work, addiction, and shame had built a cage around me.

I do not want silence to be the inheritance.

I want my children to have language earlier than I did. I want them to know that pain can be named before it becomes destruction. I want them to know that asking for help is not weakness.

I want them to know that a body can carry old fear and still learn new safety. I want them to know that love should not require self-abandonment. I want them to know that being useful is not the same as being worthy.

And I want them to know this most of all: they were never the reason I broke.

They were the reason I kept trying.

Even when I was trying wrong. Even when my trying looked like work instead of presence. Even when I was too lost inside my own fire to give them the steadiness they deserved. Even then, they were not the weight that destroyed me. They were the light I kept reaching toward from inside the smoke.

The truth is, I can see that trauma was passed down. Not just by me, and not just by their mother, but through the whole system around us. Through addiction, control, silence, lies, stigma, fear, and adults who thought they were protecting children while teaching them to live without one of their parents.

Maverick has not spoken to me in five years. Some of that is my fault, and I have to own that.

My addiction, instability, absence, symptoms, and collapse all had consequences. I cannot tell the truth about alienation and pretend I had no part in the pain. But that is not the whole story.

There were lies too. There was stigma. There were people in my family and her family who already had a version of me built in their heads, and once that version became the story, everything I did got filtered through it. Addict. Unstable. Dangerous. Selfish. A man who chose drugs over his kids. That is what they were told. That is what they were handed. When children are handed a story long enough, they learn how to live inside it before they are old enough to question who wrote it.

I never left my kids in the way people made it sound. I was pushed out, blocked, kept away, and made into the danger so other people could look like protection.

Their mother had pressure on her too. Her family blackmailed her emotionally, telling her they would disown her if she took me back. Her dad had died when she was in high school, and she did not want to lose her mom too. I understand that part now in a way I could not back then. Her mother had already shown she would cut contact if she did not get her way. That was not an empty threat. That was power.

And that power reached my children.

Her aunt helped with after-school and weekend babysitting, so losing that support meant losing help she depended on. The family system had her trapped too, but instead of breaking the control, the control got passed down. I became the one removed from the picture.

I was told my kids did not want to talk to me. They were told I did not want them. They were told

I did not love them. They were told I chose addiction over them.

That kind of lie does not just hurt a father. It changes a child's nervous system. A child does not hear, "Your dad is sick." A child hears, "Your dad chose not to love you enough." That becomes a wound. If nobody corrects it, that wound becomes identity. There was one moment before North Dakota that still says more than I knew how to say at the time.

The day I was leaving, she brought my youngest two kids to see me. I was getting ready to move 1,300 miles away, to North Dakota, with no real idea how long I would be gone or what life was going to look like after I left. It was not a weekend trip. It was not a short drive. It was a move that could change everything, and I knew there was a chance I would not see them again for a long time.

She gave me fifteen minutes.

Fifteen minutes to hug them. Fifteen minutes to look at their faces. Fifteen minutes to try to hold back everything I could not say without breaking down in front of them. Fifteen minutes to be their dad before distance became another wall between us.

Then she said she had laundry to do.

Laundry.

I was moving 1,300 miles away, and laundry was the reason the visit ended.

That moment did something to me. It was not just that she took them away. It was that the goodbye was treated like an inconvenience, like my relationship with my children could be fit into the space between chores. I stood there with the weight of leaving in my chest, knowing I was about to drive away from them and not knowing when I would get another chance.

Fifteen minutes was all I got, and then they were gone again.

That is what I mean when I say I did not simply leave my children. There were times I was kept at the edge of their lives and then blamed for the distance that created. There were times I was given scraps and expected to act grateful for them. There were times the pain of being pushed out was turned into proof that I had walked away.

The kids did not choose that. They were placed inside it. They were too young to understand the adult control around them. All they knew was that Dad was leaving, Dad was far away, Dad was not there. After enough time, the reason starts mattering less than the absence.

Shayla saw through some of it when she got older. She saw the lies, the bullshit, the way stories had been shaped around her. But by then, another damage had already happened.

They had learned how to live without me.

That is the part that breaks something in me. After enough time, the reason a parent is gone starts to matter less than the fact that they were gone. A child still has to adapt. They still have to wake up, go to school, have birthdays, build routines, survive disappointments, and keep growing around the empty space. Whether I left or was kept away, the empty space was still there. They adapted to it, and that adaptation became another loss.

My younger son is seventeen now, running the streets with drugs and alcohol around him, and I am terrified he is going to end up dead or in jail. I know that road. I know what waits there. I know how fast a kid can become a story people shake their heads about after it is too late. His mother cannot control him. The streets are raising him. I am watching from a distance, feeling the helplessness eat through me.

My youngest daughter is still kept from me too. Her mother acts like divorcing me meant the children should divorce me with her. The longer she keeps them from me, the longer they do not know the truth. The longer they do not know the truth, the easier it becomes for the lie to feel normal.

That kind of helplessness turns into rage. I need to be honest about that. There were days I hated her so much I scared myself. Days I wished the obstacle between me and my children would just disappear. Days my mind went darker than I want to admit because it felt like there was no legal, emotional, or human door left open.

That is ugly to write. But it is true.

The truth underneath that rage was not that I wanted to become cruel. The truth was that I wanted my children back. I wanted a chance to father them before the streets did. I wanted a chance to tell them I did not stop loving them. I wanted a chance to undo the lie that I chose addiction over them. I wanted a chance to say, "You were never unwanted. You were never unloved. You were caught in a war you should never have been placed inside."

That is the tragedy of alienation. It does not just separate a parent from a child. It teaches the child to survive the separation. Sometimes, by the time the truth starts coming out, survival has already hardened into distance.

That is why this hurts so much. Not because I think I was innocent, because I know I was not.

But guilt for my part does not erase what was done to me, and what was done to me does not erase what my kids lived through. All of it has to be true at the same time.

The story with Maverick still hurts in a different way because it has a specific shape. It was not just distance. It was not just years passing. It was a story that formed during one of the worst weeks of my life, and once that story was handed to him, it became harder to reach him than almost anything else.

Before COVID hit, I was managing a restaurant. My kids worked there too. Maverick washed dishes when he was fifteen or sixteen. Shayla waited tables. I was managing, cooking, waiting tables, and trying to hold the whole place together from every direction. It was stressful, but it was also one of those rare places where life still had a shape I could understand. Work had always made more sense to me than feelings. At work, I knew what needed done. Cook the food. Handle the schedule. Cover the floor. Fix the problem. Keep moving.

Then COVID hit, and everything changed fast.

I remember watching the news with Shayla. Maverick was off that day. The governor came on and shut everything down. Just like that, the job changed from difficult to impossible. I had to lay people off. People I knew. People with kids. People crying and asking how they were supposed to feed their families. They were not numbers to me. They were faces. They were voices. They were people standing in front of me scared, and I was the one who had to tell them there was nothing I could do.

That does something to a person already carrying too much.

I still had to go home after that. I still had kids in the house. School was canceled, so everyone was home more. More food was being eaten. More pressure landed in the house. Everything got tighter, and nobody had the language for what was happening yet. We were all living inside something nobody knew how to handle.

Maverick started getting unemployment. It was around 140 a week, plus the extra 600 from COVID, so he was bringing in about 740 a week. I was bringing home maybe 500 every two weeks. I was the father, the manager, the one who was supposed to provide, and my teenage son suddenly had more money coming in than I did. I can admit now that part of me was jealous. Not jealous in a simple, ugly way like I wanted to take from him. Jealous in the wounded-man way where your provider identity is already cracked, and then life holds up a mirror and shows you that your child has more income than you do.

Part of me was also trying to teach him how to be an adult. I wanted him to understand that money was not just spending money. Food, lights, water, rent, gas, bills — all of that was real.

So I made him pay bills for one month. It was around a thousand dollars. In my mind, I was trying to teach responsibility. But I can also see how it might have landed on him. He was still young. He was home during a pandemic. He had money coming in, and suddenly adults around him were asking him to cover things.

Almost every evening, his mother would tell him to buy dinner and say she would pay him back when she got paid. That happened again and again. Then we went to Branson for the weekend, and it was the same thing. Pay for this, and she would pay him back. In my mind, that money was going toward food, bills, and the family getting through that period. It was not drug money. I did not spend one dollar of Maverick's unemployment on drugs. Not one. But later, that was not the story he was told.

The week everything broke, I was already barely holding on. I had just laid people off. Some of them had begged and cried because they did not know how they were going to feed their kids. I had no power to fix it. I had no way to carry all of them, but my body still tried to carry the weight anyway. By the time I got home, I was raw from the inside out.

The trash was piled high, even on the kitchen floor. Maverick was on the PlayStation. I told him to take out the trash. He said no. He was busy.

Something in me snapped.

I am not proud of that. I am not trying to make it sound better than it was. I was exhausted, ashamed, scared, and overloaded, and I reacted out of all of it. I went over and unplugged his game. He still refused. Then his mother got there, and that was when she told all my kids they did not have to listen to me anymore.

That moment gutted me.

Not because a teenager resisted taking out the trash. Teenagers do that. Not because a parent and child had conflict. Families have conflict. It gutted me because in that moment, I felt my authority as a father collapse in front of my children. I felt erased in my own house. I felt like every piece of myself I had been trying to hold together — provider, father, manager, man — came apart at the same time.

That week was one of the lowest points of my life.

I had a noose in my closet. The internal pain was horrible in a way I still do not know how to fully explain. It felt like there was no air inside my own life. No room to be hurt. No room to be tired.

No room to fail. No room to be a father, a man, a manager, and a person all at once. I was trying to stand in the middle of too many fires, and every direction looked like loss.

I relapsed that week.

That is the truth.

After I relapsed, I stepped down as manager. Then I quit the next week. I could not keep pretending I was stable enough to lead other people while I was falling apart that badly inside.

The relapse was real. The collapse was real. My responsibility in that is real.

But the lie that came after it was real too.

Trinity told Maverick I spent all his unemployment money on drugs. He believed her.

That is the part that still burns because it took one of the most painful weeks of my life and turned it into a story where I was nothing but the villain. It erased the food. It erased the bills. It erased the dinners he was asked to buy. It erased the Branson trip. It erased the pressure of COVID, the layoffs, the shutdown, the school closings, the impossible math of everyone being home and everything costing more. It erased the fact that I was bringing home less than my teenage son during a national emergency and drowning in shame over it.

It reduced all of that to one sentence: your dad spent your money on drugs.

Once that sentence got inside him, it gave him a reason not to talk to me.

I understand why he would hate me if he believed that. If I were him, and I believed my father took my money and used it for drugs, I would be angry too. I would feel betrayed too. I would feel like the addiction mattered more than me too.

But that is not what happened.

I relapsed. I own that. I fell apart. I own that. I snapped over the trash and the PlayStation. I own that. I stepped down and quit because I could not hold the job anymore. I own that too. But I did not spend his unemployment on drugs.

The money went into the family surviving, eating, paying for things, and being used in ways he may not have fully understood at fifteen or sixteen. Some of it went to things his mother said she would pay back. Some of it went into a vacation she did not pay him back for. Later, when the details faded, the lie stayed.

That is how alienation works sometimes. It does not always need a thousand stories.

Sometimes it only needs one story repeated at the right moment, when a child is hurt enough to believe it.

Maverick was hurt. I know that. He was old enough to see the collapse, but not old enough to understand the machinery underneath it. He saw the relapse. He saw the fighting. He saw me lose control. He saw the family pressure. He saw the broken version of me, and then he was handed an explanation that made me look even worse.

That explanation became easier than the truth because the truth was complicated.

The truth was that his father was sick, ashamed, overworked, underpaid, traumatized, addicted, collapsing, and still trying. The truth was that his mother was using him financially too, even if she framed it as temporary. The truth was that COVID broke systems bigger than our family, but inside our family it became personal. The truth was that adults failed him in different ways. The truth was that I failed him too, but not in the exact way he was told.

I do not know how to fix what five years of silence has done.

I do not know how to reach a son who learned to live without me and then built a wall around the story he was given. I do not know how to make him hear me without making it sound like I am asking him to ignore his own pain. I do not want to take his anger away from him if anger is what helped him survive what he believed happened.

But I want the truth written somewhere. Not to force him, not to corner him, and not to demand forgiveness. Just so the lie is not the only record left.

Maverick, if you ever read this, I need you to know this clearly: I did relapse. I did fall apart. I did fail in ways I will carry for the rest of my life. But I did not spend your unemployment money on drugs. I did not choose drugs over you. I was drowning during COVID in ways I did not know how to survive, and I handled parts of it badly. But I loved you then. I love you now. I have never stopped being your father, even when you stopped speaking to me. I understand that love may not be enough to make you come back.

That is the consequence I have to live with.

But I will not let the lie be the only story.

I hope one day my children can see this without having to carry it. I hope one day this book gives them answers without making them responsible for my healing. I hope one day they understand that I am not asking them to forget what hurt. I am only trying to tell the truth about where the hurt came from, how it moved through me, and what I am doing now to stop it from moving through them.

That is the father I am trying to become. Not the one who never failed. The one who finally stopped hiding from the failure long enough to change what comes next.

CHAPTER 17

CONVERSATIONS AT MIDNIGHT

The silence of the late hours hits different when you have spent the whole day performing normal.

During the day, there are things to do. Messages to answer. Food to make. Videos to edit.

Songs to write. Thoughts to push down until there is time to deal with them later. Daylight gives you distractions. Noise gives you somewhere to hide. Even pain can be delayed when the world is still moving around you.

But midnight does not care about performance.

Midnight takes away the audience. It takes away the mask. It leaves you alone with the walls, the quiet, the glow of a screen, and every thought you managed to outrun while the day was still loud enough to cover it.

That was where I found myself again.

Not in a dramatic breakdown. Not in some cinematic moment where everything made sense.

Just sitting there in the late-night quiet with my mind running too fast and my chest feeling too full. The kind of night where the walls feel closer, the silence gets loud, and you reach for something, anything, to untangle the wires in your head.

It started with trying to connect.

That was the part that hurt the most.

I had poured months into a video. Not just time, but energy I barely had left. Creativity. Focus.

Pieces of myself I was trying to turn into something visible. I wanted it to mean something. I wanted the people I loved to see it and understand that I was still trying, still creating, still reaching from the inside of whatever this life had become.

I showed it to the people I cared about most.

Silence.

Teaguen said he did not have time. Shayla brushed it off like it did not matter.

I tried to tell myself not to take it personally. People are busy. Kids have their own lives. Nobody owes me the reaction I want. I know all of that. I can say all of that from the part of me that understands. But another part of me did not hear “busy.” It heard rejection. It heard indifference.

It heard, “What you made does not matter enough to stop for.”

Then came the songs.

I had written songs for her. Not because I thought a song could fix everything, but because sometimes music can say what regular words cannot carry. I put real feeling into them. I tried to make something better than the noise on the radio, something with a pulse in it, something that could reach across the distance and say what I could not say cleanly out loud.

They went unheard. Unacknowledged.

That hurt too.

Not because of the work itself. The work mattered, but it was not only about the work. It was about the need underneath it. The need to be seen. The need to be understood. The need to matter to someone without having to beg for proof.

That is where my brain went to work on me.

It took silence and turned it into evidence. It took someone being busy and turned it into abandonment. It took a brushed-off video, an unheard song, a missing response, and stacked them into the same old sentence I had been fighting my whole life.

You do not matter.

You are too much.

You are broken.

That old tape started playing again. Not as a thought I chose, but as a weather system moving in. I could feel it changing the room. My chest got tight. My stomach sank. My mind started trying to build a case against me using every silence it could find.

Three people had told me last year that I did not matter. Different words, different moments, same wound. For a while, I believed them. Or maybe the worst part is that they did not have to convince me very hard. The belief was already there, buried deep enough that one careless sentence could wake it up.

That night, I started talking out loud to the empty room.

I do that sometimes when the thoughts get too tangled to keep inside. It feels strange to admit, but speaking them out loud gives them shape. Inside my head, everything loops. Out loud, the loop has to become sentences. It has to slow down enough for breath to carry it.

At first, it was just pain coming out. Frustration. Embarrassment. Shame. The kind of shame that comes from needing connection and hating yourself for needing it. I heard myself talking about the video, the songs, the silence, the way I kept reaching toward people and feeling like my hand came back empty.

Then something shifted.

Not fixed. Not healed. Shifted.

I started to see that vulnerability was not weakness. Vulnerability was exposure, and exposure was the only way I could stop lying to myself. My tears were not failure. My need for connection was not pathetic. They were proof that the nervous system had not flatlined yet. Proof that some part of me still wanted to be reached, even after everything in me had learned to hide.

That mattered.

Because hiding is easy for me. Not emotionally easy, but familiar. My whole system knows how to disappear. Shut down before they leave. Pull back before they reject you. Do not need too much. Do not ask again. Do not risk becoming embarrassing. Protect yourself by becoming unavailable first.

That blueprint is old.

It shows up everywhere.

There was a woman I wanted to talk to. She seemed interested. There was enough there that a healthier person might have just taken a small step, had a conversation, let something unfold without turning it into a life-or-death event. But my brain did not handle it like that.

My brain screamed, "Abort."

You will ruin it. You will hurt her. You are too much. You are not ready. You will drag her into the smoke. Walk away before you become the reason someone else suffers.

So I did.

I broke my own heart trying to save hers.

That is hard to admit because it sounds backwards until you understand the fear underneath it. I was not trying to be noble in some clean way. I was trying to prevent a future where my damage spilled onto somebody else. I was trying to disappear before attachment had a chance to become another fire. I was trying to protect her from a version of me I was still afraid of.

But avoidance can wear the mask of protection.

Sometimes walking away is wisdom. Sometimes it is fear pretending to be wisdom. The hard part is learning the difference when your nervous system treats closeness like danger and loneliness like proof.

That night, I did not know the difference. I only knew I was tired of fighting invisible battles that nobody else could see.

There is a specific shame in being a grown man and still crying too often. A shame in being forty-two and still needing space to breathe. A shame in wanting reassurance but hating yourself for wanting it. A shame in trying to create, trying to connect, trying to offer pieces of yourself, and feeling like they land in a room where nobody looks up.

I sat with that shame for a while.

Not because I wanted to, but because there was nowhere else to put it. I thought about my kids.

I thought about the distance. I thought about the ways I had failed them and the ways I had been kept from them. I thought about the lie that silence tells when nobody explains it. I thought about the part of me that wanted to beg for their love and the part of me that wanted to build a wall so the next rejection would not crack my ribs.

That is one of the ugliest places to live inside.

Begging feels humiliating. Walls feel safer. But the heart does not stop loving just because the mind is trying to survive.

I wondered if moving forward meant pretending they never existed. I wondered if that was the only way to stop the bleeding. If I could not reach them, maybe I had to bury the need. Maybe I had to act like the door was closed forever. Maybe I had to convince myself I did not need the people I loved most because needing them kept destroying me.

But I cannot do that.

The heart does not work like that.

It still beats for them. Even in absence. Even in silence. Even when the distance has lasted long enough to become its own kind of life.

That is the part people do not always understand about estrangement. The world keeps moving, but love does not always get the message. Birthdays come. Holidays come. Songs come on.

Pictures show up. A memory catches you at the wrong time. Their names still live somewhere in the body. You can try to move forward, but you do not stop being their father because the phone stays quiet.

So how do you keep going?

That was the question sitting in the room with me.

Not how do you fix everything. Not how do you make them call. Not how do you undo the past or force the truth into places where people are not ready to hear it. Just how do you keep going when love is still there, regret is still there, and the people you want most may not be reachable?

Maybe the answer lives somewhere between surrender and stubbornness.

Surrender, because I cannot control their hearts. I cannot force repair. I cannot make anyone ready. I cannot chase connection so hard that my panic becomes another burden they have to carry.

Stubbornness, because I refuse to let silence turn me into someone who stops loving. I refuse to let rejection make me cruel. I refuse to let shame decide that my life is over because some doors are closed right now.

Moving forward does not mean erasing them. It does not mean erasing the damage either. It means learning to carry both without letting either one crush me. It means building a life where love, regret, healing, and hope can share the same room without one of them burning the whole place down.

That night, I reminded myself of things I forget when shame gets loud.

I am not perfect. I am trying.

I am flawed. I am real.

I have hurt people, and I still have worth.

I have failed, and I am still responsible for what I do next.

I need connection, and that does not make me pathetic.

I cry, and that does not make me less of a man.

I am lonely, and loneliness is not proof that I am unlovable.

Those sentences did not make the pain disappear, but they gave me something to hold besides the old tape.

The old tape said I did not matter.

The new truth was quieter, but it was still there: I am still here.

Still creating. Still reaching. Still trying to tell the truth without letting the truth become a weapon.

Still loving people who may never understand me. Still trying to become safer than I was. Still trying to build something out of pieces I used to only know how to hide.

That is not nothing.

Some nights, that is the whole fight.

Not a breakthrough. Not a miracle. Just refusing to let the darkest interpretation be the final one.

That is what midnight gave me that night. Not peace exactly, but a conversation with myself that did not end in surrender. I had spent so many years treating my emotions like evidence against me that it felt strange to see them as information. The hurt was information. The tears were information. The longing was information. The shame was information. The panic was information.

None of it meant I was broken beyond repair.

It meant there was still something in me asking to be understood.

That is different.

This was not just reflection. It was a contract with myself.

To keep fighting. To keep creating. To keep loving even when it is hard. To keep telling the truth without demanding that everyone be ready for it. To keep building a life that does not require me to erase my children, my grief, or myself in order to survive.

To keep going.

Even at midnight.

Especially at midnight.

CHAPTER 18

THE TAILGATE

For Chastidy

There are people who show up when things are good, when you are funny and useful and holding yourself together well enough to be easy to love.

Then there are people who show up straight from work at one in the morning when your life is on fire and everyone else has decided they do not know you anymore.

Chastidy was the second kind.

I need to tell you about the worst day of my life before I can tell you about her, because you cannot understand what she did without understanding what she walked into.

It started around five that evening. I will not go into every detail, because some parts of that day still feel like they belong in a locked room. What I can say is that I spent that afternoon being questioned about something serious for hours. When it was over, they brought me home and searched my room for another hour. Then they left without telling me anything.

They just left.

No explanation. No clear answer. No clean ending. Just me standing there not knowing if they were coming back, not knowing if that was my last night of freedom, not knowing anything except that my whole world had collapsed and I was alone inside it. By the time they were gone, the word was already moving through town. That is how small towns work. Rumors travel faster than truth, and people start building the story before they know the facts. They thought I had been caught and let go. They thought I had made a deal. They thought I was talking.

So I picked up the phone.

Nobody answered.

Friends I had known for years. People I thought would pick up no matter what. One by one, the calls went unanswered. The messages sat there. The silence got louder every time I tried again and got nothing back. In a small town, when the story is already written, nobody wants to be the one standing beside the man everyone has decided is finished.

I sat with that from five in the evening until the middle of the night.

If you have Complex PTSD, if you know what it is to have a nervous system wired for abandonment before you could even speak, you know what that kind of silence does. It does not just feel lonely. It feels like confirmation of everything your body has always believed: when it really matters, people leave. When things get ugly, you become too much. When the room fills with smoke, everyone else finds a door and you are left inside. That night, I was suicidal.

I need to say that plainly. Not in a vague way. Not as a dramatic line. In the specific, concrete way that happens when a nervous system has finally run out of reasons it can feel in the moment. I was not thinking clearly. I was not weighing life like a calm man with options. I was in the kind of pain where the mind starts looking for exits because staying feels impossible.

Then my phone rang.

It was Chastidy.

She said she had just gotten off work. She did not ask if I was okay. She did not need to. She just said she was coming.

She came straight from her shift. She did not go home first. She did not change clothes. She did not stop anywhere. She came directly to where I was, pulled up in her brown Ford Ranger, sat down beside me on the tailgate, and stayed.

She was pregnant then.

That part matters.

I remember going back inside my house to get her something to eat. Even with my own life falling apart, some part of me still knew to take care of her. I came back out, then went in again and got her a blanket and a pillow so she would have something softer to sit on.

We shared the blanket on the tailgate.

That is one of the pieces my memory kept. Not every word. Not every detail. But the blanket stayed. The pillow stayed. Her sitting there pregnant stayed. Me trying to make her comfortable while my own world felt like it had split open stayed.

At some point that night, I confronted her about the pregnancy. I told her why I thought the baby was mine. I laid out what made it look that way, what I could not get out of my head, what my heart already believed even if the facts were tangled.

She did not get loud. She did not make it into a fight. She told me she knew how it looked, but she said she was telling the truth.

I heard her.

But I still knew something in my heart.

I believed then, and part of me still believes now, that she was carrying my daughter.

That is not something I can prove on the page. I know that. I am not writing it like a court document. I am writing it like a wound, because that is how it has lived in me. Not clean. Not settled. Not resolved. Just there.

A question with a heartbeat attached to it.

That made the night heavier in ways I did not understand at the time. Chastidy was not only the person who came when everyone else disappeared. She was also sitting beside me carrying a life I believed might be mine, while I was trying not to lose my own.

There was fear in that. There was tenderness in it too. There was confusion, grief, love, suspicion, hope, and the kind of ache that does not know where to land.

And still, she stayed.

Pregnant, tired, straight from work, sitting on a pillow on the tailgate, wrapped in a blanket with me while the rest of the town went silent.

That is the part I do not want to lose.

Because that night was never simple.

It was crisis and care. Suspicion and tenderness. Love and fear. Survival and the possibility of a child I believed in my heart was mine.

We talked until the sun came up.

I do not remember everything we said. Trauma has a way of burning the details off and leaving only the shape of things. What I remember is the dark, the tailgate, her voice, the shared blanket, the brown truck, and the slow way the sky changed from black to gray to the first pale light of morning.

I remember her still being there when it did.

I did not have the word for what she did then. I did not know about co-regulation. I did not know how one steady nervous system can help another one come back from the edge. I did not know the language for trauma responses, abandonment wounds, or the way presence can become medicine to a body that has only known panic.

I only knew my body stopped falling so hard because someone stayed.

She did not fix the situation. The fear was still there when the sun came up. The uncertainty was still there. The silence from everyone else was still there. The question about the baby was still there. Nothing about the outside world had magically changed.

But I was no longer alone in it.

For someone with Complex PTSD, that can be the difference between staying and not staying.

Every nervous system runs on patterns. It predicts what will happen next based on what happened before. My data, from the beginning, had said people leave when things get hard.

The incubator taught distance. The blanket taught silence. The losses taught bracing. The relationships taught me that closeness could disappear without warning.

That night, Chastidy proved the pattern wrong.

She came when it got hard.

That kind of being seen does something to a person. It does not heal everything. It does not erase the old wounds. It does not make life suddenly safe. But it gives the body a piece of information it did not have before.

Someone came.

Years later, I found her again on Facebook when I was living in North Dakota. We started talking, and one night I told her I was going to a woman's house and could not understand why I was crying so hard. It had been over a year since my last relationship ended, and I was still grieving it every single day.

Chastidy knew immediately what it meant.

She said my body was telling me it was really the end. She said I was crying because somewhere deep in my nervous system, I knew that walking through that door meant finally letting go. The tears were not really about the new woman. They were about the old one. They were about the ending I had not let myself feel yet.

She told me she would stay by her phone all night.

So I went.

And I texted Chastidy all night from that house. I told her everything as it was happening. Every thought. Every feeling. Every panic. Every piece of me that did not know what to do with itself.

She stayed on the other end of that phone and listened without judgment, without agenda, without making it about herself.

At the end of the night, she told me I deserved a good woman. She told me she knew what I had been through. She told me I deserved better than what most of them had given me.

I carried those words.

There is something that happens to people with Complex PTSD that I still do not think we have enough language for. When you spend long enough being unseen, you start to believe invisibility is your nature. You start to believe being truly known is something that happens to other people. Easier people. Calmer people. People whose nervous systems do not turn love into a war zone.

You start to believe the most you can hope for is being tolerated. Managed. Kept at arm's length by people who mean well but cannot quite reach you.

Then someone like Chastidy comes along.

She did not manage me. She did not keep me at arm's length. She saw the whole thing: the wreckage, the survival, the complicated truth, the shame, the fear, the part of me that wanted to live and the part that did not know how to keep doing it. And she showed up anyway.

Straight from work. In the middle of the night. Pregnant. Sitting on a tailgate with a pillow and a shared blanket while the rest of the town went silent.

That kind of being seen does not just feel good. It touches something deeper than comfort. It reaches the part of the body that has spent a lifetime waiting for people to leave, and for one night, that part gets different evidence.

Someone came.

Chastidy died in 2024.

I did not get to say goodbye. The last message between us was a misunderstanding I never got the chance to explain. I have carried that silence like a stone in my chest since the day I found out she was gone. The grief of losing someone is hard enough. The grief of an unfinished sentence is its own kind of wound. It does not close cleanly because the mind keeps reaching for a conversation it can never have.

But I am writing this because she deserves to be more than a name on a list.

She deserves to be the chapter where I tell the truth about what presence can do. She deserves to be remembered as someone who came when everyone else went silent. She deserves to be more than the misunderstanding at the end. She deserves the tailgate, the sunrise, the brown

Ford Ranger, the blanket, the pillow, the food I brought her, the question neither of us could settle cleanly, the phone call in North Dakota, and the words I carried after she said I deserved better.

She deserves to be part of the proof that love is possible even for a nervous system like mine.

Not perfect love. Not rescue. Not the kind of fantasy that turns a person into a savior. Real presence. Human presence. The kind that sits beside you in the dark without needing to solve everything.

If you are reading this and you have Complex PTSD, if you have spent your whole life waiting for people to leave, if you have never believed anyone could really see you and stay, I want you to know that it happened to me.

On the worst night of my life.

On a tailgate, in the dark, after everyone else went silent.

Her name was Chastidy.

And she came.

Some people are medicine. Not the kind that fixes everything. The kind that keeps you alive long enough to find your way back.

She was that for me.

And I hope you find yours.

CHAPTER 18

THE TAILGATE

For Chastidy Dodge

There are people who show up when things are good, when you are funny and useful and holding yourself together well enough to be easy to love.

Then there are people who show up straight from work at one in the morning when your life is on fire and everyone else has decided they do not know you anymore.

Chastidy was the second kind.

I need to tell you about the worst day of my life before I can tell you about her, because you cannot understand what she did without understanding what she walked into.

It started around five that evening. I will not go into every detail, because some parts of that day still feel like they belong in a locked room. What I can say is that I spent that afternoon being questioned about something serious for hours. When it was over, they brought me home and searched my room for another hour. Then they left without telling me anything.

They just left.

No explanation. No clear answer. No clean ending. Just me standing there not knowing if they were coming back, not knowing if that was my last night of freedom, not knowing anything except that my whole world had collapsed and I was alone inside it. By the time they were gone, the word was already moving through town. That is how small towns work. Rumors travel faster than truth, and people start building the story before they know the facts. They thought I had been caught and let go. They thought I had made a deal. They thought I was talking.

So I picked up the phone.

Nobody answered.

Friends I had known for years. People I thought would pick up no matter what. One by one, the calls went unanswered. The messages sat there. The silence got louder every time I tried again and got nothing back. In a small town, when the story is already written, nobody wants to be the one standing beside the man everyone has decided is finished.

I sat with that from five in the evening until the middle of the night.

If you have Complex PTSD, if you know what it is to have a nervous system wired for abandonment before you could even speak, you know what that kind of silence does. It does not just feel lonely. It feels like confirmation of everything your body has always believed: when it really matters, people leave. When things get ugly, you become too much. When the room fills with smoke, everyone else finds a door and you are left inside. That night, I was suicidal.

I need to say that plainly. Not in a vague way. Not as a dramatic line. In the specific, concrete way that happens when a nervous system has finally run out of reasons it can feel in the moment. I was not thinking clearly. I was not weighing life like a calm man with options. I was in the kind of pain where the mind starts looking for exits because staying feels impossible.

Then my phone rang.

It was Chastidy.

She said she had just gotten off work. She did not ask if I was okay. She did not need to. She just said she was coming.

She came straight from her shift. She did not go home first. She did not change clothes. She did not stop anywhere. She came directly to where I was, pulled up in her brown Ford Ranger, sat down beside me on the tailgate, and stayed.

She was pregnant then.

That part matters.

I remember going back inside my house to get her something to eat. Even with my own life falling apart, some part of me still knew to take care of her. I came back out, then went in again and got her a blanket and a pillow so she would have something softer to sit on.

We shared the blanket on the tailgate.

That is one of the pieces my memory kept. Not every word. Not every detail. But the blanket stayed. The pillow stayed. Her sitting there pregnant stayed. Me trying to make her comfortable while my own world felt like it had split open stayed.

At some point that night, I confronted her about the pregnancy. I told her why I thought the baby was mine. I laid out what made it look that way, what I could not get out of my head, what my heart already believed even if the facts were tangled.

She did not get loud. She did not make it into a fight. She told me she knew how it looked, but she said she was telling the truth.

I heard her.

But I still knew something in my heart.

I believed then, and part of me still believes now, that she was carrying my daughter.

That is not something I can prove on the page. I know that. I am not writing it like a court document. I am writing it like a wound, because that is how it has lived in me. Not clean. Not settled. Not resolved. Just there.

A question with a heartbeat attached to it.

That made the night heavier in ways I did not understand at the time. Chastidy was not only the person who came when everyone else disappeared. She was also sitting beside me carrying a life I believed might be mine, while I was trying not to lose my own.

There was fear in that. There was tenderness in it too. There was confusion, grief, love, suspicion, hope, and the kind of ache that does not know where to land.

And still, she stayed.

Pregnant, tired, straight from work, sitting on a pillow on the tailgate, wrapped in a blanket with me while the rest of the town went silent.

That is the part I do not want to lose.

Because that night was never simple.

It was crisis and care. Suspicion and tenderness. Love and fear. Survival and the possibility of a child I believed in my heart was mine.

We talked until the sun came up.

I do not remember everything we said. Trauma has a way of burning the details off and leaving only the shape of things. What I remember is the dark, the tailgate, her voice, the shared blanket, the brown truck, and the slow way the sky changed from black to gray to the first pale light of morning.

I remember her still being there when it did.

I did not have the word for what she did then. I did not know about co-regulation. I did not know how one steady nervous system can help another one come back from the edge. I did not know the language for trauma responses, abandonment wounds, or the way presence can become medicine to a body that has only known panic.

I only knew my body stopped falling so hard because someone stayed.

She did not fix the situation. The fear was still there when the sun came up. The uncertainty was still there. The silence from everyone else was still there. The question about the baby was still there. Nothing about the outside world had magically changed.

But I was no longer alone in it.

For someone with Complex PTSD, that can be the difference between staying and not staying.

Every nervous system runs on patterns. It predicts what will happen next based on what happened before. My data, from the beginning, had said people leave when things get hard.

The incubator taught distance. The blanket taught silence. The losses taught bracing. The relationships taught me that closeness could disappear without warning.

That night, Chastidy proved the pattern wrong.

She came when it got hard.

That kind of being seen does something to a person. It does not heal everything. It does not erase the old wounds. It does not make life suddenly safe. But it gives the body a piece of information it did not have before.

Someone came.

Years later, I found her again on Facebook when I was living in North Dakota. We started talking, and one night I told her I was going to a woman's house and could not understand why I was crying so hard. It had been over a year since my last relationship ended, and I was still grieving it every single day.

Chastidy knew immediately what it meant.

She said my body was telling me it was really the end. She said I was crying because somewhere deep in my nervous system, I knew that walking through that door meant finally letting go. The tears were not really about the new woman. They were about the old one. They were about the ending I had not let myself feel yet.

She told me she would stay by her phone all night.

So I went.

And I texted Chastidy all night from that house. I told her everything as it was happening. Every thought. Every feeling. Every panic. Every piece of me that did not know what to do with itself.

She stayed on the other end of that phone and listened without judgment, without agenda, without making it about herself.

At the end of the night, she told me I deserved a good woman. She told me she knew what I had been through. She told me I deserved better than what most of them had given me.

I carried those words.

There is something that happens to people with Complex PTSD that I still do not think we have enough language for. When you spend long enough being unseen, you start to believe invisibility is your nature. You start to believe being truly known is something that happens to other people. Easier people. Calmer people. People whose nervous systems do not turn love into a war zone.

You start to believe the most you can hope for is being tolerated. Managed. Kept at arm's length by people who mean well but cannot quite reach you.

Then someone like Chastidy comes along.

She did not manage me. She did not keep me at arm's length. She saw the whole thing: the wreckage, the survival, the complicated truth, the shame, the fear, the part of me that wanted to live and the part that did not know how to keep doing it. And she showed up anyway.

Straight from work. In the middle of the night. Pregnant. Sitting on a tailgate with a pillow and a shared blanket while the rest of the town went silent.

That kind of being seen does not just feel good. It touches something deeper than comfort. It reaches the part of the body that has spent a lifetime waiting for people to leave, and for one night, that part gets different evidence.

Someone came.

Chastidy Dodge died in July 2025.

I did not get to say goodbye. The last message between us was a misunderstanding I never got the chance to explain. I have carried that silence like a stone in my chest since the day I found out she was gone. The grief of losing someone is hard enough. The grief of an unfinished sentence is its own kind of wound. It does not close cleanly because the mind keeps reaching for a conversation it can never have.

But I am writing this because she deserves to be more than a name on a list.

She deserves to be the chapter where I tell the truth about what presence can do. She deserves to be remembered as someone who came when everyone else went silent. She deserves to be

CHAPTER 19

597 more than the misunderstanding at the end. She deserves the tailgate, the sunrise, the brown

Ford Ranger, the blanket, the pillow, the food I brought her, the question neither of us could settle cleanly, the phone call in North Dakota, and the words I carried after she said I deserved better.

She deserves to be part of the proof that love is possible even for a nervous system like mine.

Not perfect love. Not rescue. Not the kind of fantasy that turns a person into a savior. Real presence. Human presence. The kind that sits beside you in the dark without needing to solve everything.

If you are reading this and you have Complex PTSD, if you have spent your whole life waiting for people to leave, if you have never believed anyone could really see you and stay, I want you to know that it happened to me.

On the worst night of my life.

On a tailgate, in the dark, after everyone else went silent.

Her name was Chastidy Dodge.

And she came.

Some people are medicine. Not the kind that fixes everything. The kind that keeps you alive long enough to find your way back.

She was that for me.

And I hope you find yours.

FINDING THE MAP IN THE MADNESS

The legal timeline is stark.

Cold facts. Dates. Charges. Failures. The kind of record that looks simple from the outside because paper has no nervous system.

Paper does not sweat. Paper does not freeze. Paper does not dissociate. Paper does not lose time. Paper does not feel its chest tighten when a court date gets close. Paper just records what happened.

Driving on a suspended license. Failure to appear. Failure to comply. Warrants. Brief attempts at compliance followed by collapse.

On paper, it paints a picture of someone who just could not follow rules. Someone irresponsible.

Someone defiant. Someone who did not care enough to show up.

For a long time, that is how I saw it too.

Another layer of failure. Another file proving what shame had been saying for years.

You are the problem.

But Complex PTSD does not care how things look. It cares how they land.

And court landed like threat.

Authority landed like threat. Deadlines landed like threat. Paperwork landed like threat.

Probation landed like threat. Phone calls landed like threat. Anything that felt like judgment, punishment, or public failure lit up the same alarm.

The pattern was not rebellion.

It was hijack.

A nervous system hijacking my intentions the second stress got too high.

That does not make the consequences fake. The warrants were real. The missed dates were real. The failures were real. The damage to trust was real.

But the mechanism was not simple defiance.

It was a body built for survival crashing into a system built for compliance.

Those two systems speak different languages. The legal system asks: did you show up, did you pay, did you complete it, did you follow instructions, did you comply?

Trauma asks different questions. Am I safe? Can I move? Can I breathe? Can I think? Can I survive this moment?

Those are not the same questions.

And when the body is stuck in survival, compliance becomes harder than people understand.

Executive Dysfunction Under Stress

People think following through is just a character issue.

You either care or you do not. You either do it or you do not. You either show up or you do not.

That sounds clean.

It is not.

Following through takes executive function. Planning, remembering, organizing, prioritizing, sequencing, managing time, making calls, reading instructions, keeping track of dates, and staying calm enough to act. That part of the brain does not work right when the survival system takes over.

Stress hits, the alarm goes off, and the thinking brain goes dim. Suddenly, simple things become impossible.

A court date is not just a date. It becomes a threat marker. A probation requirement is not just a task. It becomes pressure. A phone call is not just a phone call. It becomes exposure.

The more important something is, the more threat attaches to it.

That is the cruel part.

The things I most needed to handle became the things most likely to shut me down.

I could know something mattered and still not be able to organize myself around it. I could know missing court would make things worse and still freeze. I could know I needed to call and still stare at the phone like it weighed a hundred pounds.

That does not look good from the outside.

I know that.

It looks like not caring.

But inside, it felt like my brain went underwater. The instructions blurred. The dates floated away. The next step disappeared. Then shame came in and made everything heavier.

Avoidance and Freeze

Freeze is not the same as refusal.

That needs to be said again and again until systems start hearing it.

Refusal has a choice in it.

Freeze has terror.

Refusal says, "I won't."

Freeze says, "I can't move."

From the outside, they can look the same.

That is the problem.

Courtrooms and authority figures became massive triggers for me. Not because I thought I was above the law. Not because I did not understand consequences. Because the whole situation felt like being trapped.

Eyes on me. Rules I did not fully understand. Language that sounded official and cold. A judge above me. A room where one wrong move could make everything worse.

That setup hit the same old wiring.

The blanket. The glass box. The closets. Danger. Be still. Do not draw attention. Survive.

So when stress got too high, my body did what it had always done.

Freeze.

Legs locked. Mind blank. Chest tight. Time gone weird. A whole grown man unable to do the next obvious thing.

People say, "Just go."

They do not understand that sometimes "just go" feels like walking into incoming fire.

They say, "Just call."

They do not understand that sometimes a phone call feels like stepping in front of a firing squad.

They say, "Just handle your business."

They do not understand that trauma can turn business into threat.

That is not an excuse.

It is the map.

Dissociation and Memory Gaps

Stress also messed with my memory.

Not in a convenient way. Not in a fake way. In the way a brain protects itself by not fully recording what overwhelms it.

Judges. Probation officers. Court staff. Instructions. Dates. Conditions. Do this. Do not do that.

Come here. Pay this. Call them. Sign that.

A regulated brain can take that in, write it down, plan around it, and follow through.

A flooded brain does not work like that.

A flooded brain hears words through water. It catches pieces and misses others. It nods because it knows nodding is expected. Then later, the details are gone.

Not because I did not care.

Because I was not fully there.

That is dissociation. The body stays in the room. The mind pulls back. Enough to survive, but not enough to function well.

Then later, people say, "You were told."

And they are right.

I was told.

But being told and being able to encode it are not the same thing.

That difference matters, especially inside systems that punish failure without asking what kind of brain state the person was in when instructions were given.

Shame Reinforcement

Every missed date made the next one harder.

That is the loop.

I would fail, and then shame would speak.

See? You cannot handle it. You are broken. You are irresponsible. You are exactly what they think you are.

That shame did not motivate me. It tightened the trap.

Because now the next court date was not just a court date. It was every previous failure standing behind it. Every warrant. Every disappointed look. Every lecture. Every accusation.

Every ugly thing I believed about myself.

The pressure got heavier. The freeze came faster. The consequences got worse. Then shame got louder.

That is how systems can accidentally create the very behavior they punish. Not because consequences are fake, but because shame and threat do not improve executive function.

They crush it.

If a person already freezes under pressure, adding humiliation does not create responsibility. It creates more pressure, more freeze, more avoidance, more failure, and more shame.

A vicious loop dressed up as accountability.

Substance Use as Override

Sometimes meth broke through the freeze.

That is another ugly truth.

It gave movement when my body had shut down. It forced energy into a dead system. It made the fog lift for a while. It made impossible things feel doable.

That does not make it good. It does not make it safe. It does not erase what it cost. But it explains part of the hook.

Other times, substances were an escape from the anxiety before shutdown hit. A way to not feel the court date. A way to not feel the shame. A way to not feel the dread. A way to not feel the whole room closing in.

Either way, it fed the legal spiral.

Use made functioning worse in the long run. Shame made use more tempting. Legal pressure made shame louder. The whole thing fed itself.

Pain. Pressure. Freeze. Use. Consequences. Shame. More pressure. More freeze. More use.

That is not a simple moral failure.

That is a machine.

And machines keep running until someone interrupts the mechanism.

The Docket and the Nervous System

The failures to appear and failures to comply were not just failures of will.

They were often the result of a brain and body desperately trying, and failing, to cope with unbearable internal states triggered by external pressure.

The choices were mine. The consequences are mine. I own that. But owning something does not mean lying about how it worked.

The mechanism matters, because if you call every trauma response defiance, you build the wrong solution. You threaten harder. You shame louder. You punish more. Sometimes that just drives the person deeper into the exact shutdown you are trying to stop.

A trauma-informed system would still hold people accountable. It would still require follow-through. It would still protect the community. But it would understand that some people need scaffolding, not just consequences.

Written instructions. Reminders. Case management. Clear steps. Human language.
Less

humiliation. A way to re-enter compliance after freeze without the whole system becoming another trauma chamber.

That is not coddling.

That is strategy.

Because the goal should be function, not just punishment.

The Other Map: The Names

Then there is the other map.

The names.

Twenty-four dead. Not a statistic, not a dramatic phrase, but a timeline carved into bone.

Sylvie Dean Kraus. Nicholas D. Williams. Thomas Paul Williams. Herbert William Lingar. Judy Ann Lingar. Argie Faye Williams. Ashley Nicole Williams. Warren Wade Ellett. Chad Argus

Acord. William Garrett Lingar. Daniel Lee Stewart. Jerry Don Williams. Justin Dean Phillips.

Todd Anthony Lingar. Marie Elizabeth Lingar. Gabriel Allen Woods. Jason Jones. Paula Faye

Pitts. John Wesley Robinson. Patricia Lynn Lingar. Deanna Lynn Teague. Clint Lee Larrison.

Joseph David Middleton. Billy Aaron Dean Woods. Chastidy Dodge.

Twenty-four names. Twenty-four ruptures. Twenty-four reminders that loss was not an idea in my life. It was a pattern.

Grief does not stack neatly. It overlaps. It echoes. It waits.

Each loss trained my predictive model.

Tragedy is the baseline.

That is not paranoia.

That is pattern recognition.

You do not lose that many people and expect calm. You learn to brace. You learn not to trust good news. You learn the phone ringing can change your life. You learn silence can mean death. You learn funerals are not rare interruptions. They are chapters.

A body that has lived through that much loss does not walk into the world neutral.

It walks in carrying the next disaster before it happens.

That is why calm felt suspicious. That is why joy felt temporary. That is why attachment felt dangerous. That is why my body stayed ready.

Because too many times, ready felt like the only sane response.

The Two Maps Together

The legal docket and the loss list are mirrors.

One shows the external fallout of an overloaded system.

The other shows the emotional toll of sustained exposure to rupture.

One says: here is where the world recorded your failures.

The other says: here is what your body was carrying while you failed.

Together, they form a map of the terrain I had been walking through.

Not to excuse it. Not to wallow in it. To name it.

Because you cannot navigate what you refuse to name.

If I only look at the docket, I see a criminal pattern. If I only look at the grief, I see a wounded man.

Both are incomplete.

The truth is in the collision.

A wounded man made harmful choices inside systems that did not understand the wound. A nervous system shaped by loss crashed into legal demands that required regulation, memory, organization, and follow-through. A man drowning in shame kept getting handed more shame and told to swim better.

That was the madness.

The map does not erase the madness.

It shows the roads that led there.

And once you can see the roads, maybe you can stop walking the same ones blind.

That is the point now.

Not innocence.

Direction.

Not self-pity.

Pattern recognition.

Not blame.

A map.

Because a map does not save you by itself, but it can show you where you are.

And after years of wandering through fire, knowing where you are is not small.

It is the first honest ground.